With great food, great entertainment and great family fun, a splendid time is guaranteed for all.

We look forward to seeing you at the Taste. Opa!

This year, Montreal-based Pilaros International Trading is once again gratified to sponsor the 19th Annual Taste of The Danforth. To President Miltiadis ("Milton") Antypas, the Taste is much more than a branding opportunity.

"When we were first approached about sponsoring the Taste, we were aware of its history, and excited at the chance to be involved. We knew it was a wonderful cause. Now in our fourth year as Title Sponsor, we continue to be impressed at the community's participation and the passion they bring to the event, at all levels.

We share that passion. Our entire team is focused on ensuring that this year's Taste is the best ever.

We are proud to associate our name with such a prestigious event. But it's much more than a marketing opportunity. It's a chance to help save lives. We'd like to thank everyone involved — the Toronto East General Hospital, the merchants, and especially, you the public — for helping to make this a reality. Opa!"

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

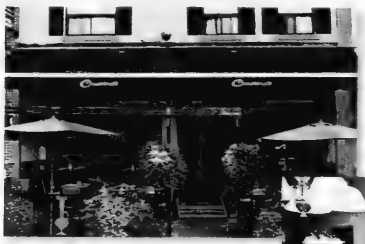
In GreekTown, authenticity is spelled "Christina's"

The term "authentic" is ubiquitous in regional cuisine. Rarely will you find a menu that doesn't boldly proclaim it.

But what does "authentic" really mean if everyone advertises it? Ask a native. It may look promising in print, but hearing a Greek say it rings truer.



To dine at Christina's is to learn the difference between authentic and tellon (perfect).

Tellon means the guests at the next table who've recently arrived from Athens, Thessaloniki, Patras or Heraklion find their food so much like home they forget they're on foreign soil.

This ability to lose yourself in the pleasure of the moment is as essential to your dining experience as the food itself. And no venue elevates you to those lofty heights like Christina's. Enjoyed in the richly textured elegance of its dining room or the sunswept comfort of its patio, its Greek cuisine has captivated Danforth-goers for decades. The grand old girl just keeps getting better.

Nor, of course, does Christina's clientele consist predominately of visiting Greeks. It's just that the Greeks who do visit seem to gravitate here. Word gets around. The opportunity to enjoy home cooking away from home is irresistible to many.

Christina's cachet stems in no small part from its universality. It appeals to people of all ages and from all walks of life. It accommodates all events and moods. A quiet family dinner? A boisterous birthday party? A starlit midnight toast? Christina's is all of these things. For the broadest cross-section of Mediterranean food lovers, "Dinner at Christina's" is the easiest decision they'll ever make.

On Sunday, Christina's puts on its brunch hat, serving up elegant fare for the price of a standard breakfast special. Weekend family outings are feasible here even on a budget.

Christina's selection of wines (Greek in particular) rivals some private collections. Wine connoisseurs are in their element here, but even if you're not knowledgeable, you can always count on your server to recommend the appropriate vintage.

Live Greek music and belly dancing on Friday and Saturday evenings is still a mainstay, and GreekTown's only year-round heated patio ensures your comfort when Mother Nature doesn't.

Christina's management seems to have thought of everything, but like the perennial honours student, they never stop striving for excellence. Once you've reached the head of your class, your clientele — like the parent who expects straight A's — will accept no less.

Pantheon a Greek fishing village at heart

The tranquility of a Greek fishing village at dawn is a recurring theme in Mediterranean seascape photography. To any Greek born and raised in that environment, it is symbolic of hearth and home. To people of other backgrounds, it evokes vague stirrings of a simpler time and place; we've all been there, in spirit if not in body.

Pantheon not only takes you to that little village, they sit you down at their dinner table and serve you the catch of the day. It might consist of Red snapper, Atlantic salmon and sea bass, as well as many other exotic selections you're unlikely to find elsewhere. Baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies are imported directly from Greece. Striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others, impeccably prepared and seasoned, gratify the most discriminating fish lovers. At Pantheon, you could dine on a different fresh fish every day for a fortnight.

But selection alone does not a reputation make. Freshness is paramount and timing critical, particularly with fish and seafood. A minute too long on the grill or in the pan can detract from moistness, texture and taste. And no Swiss watch has the timing down better than Executive Chef Nick Paroussis.

Paroussis' partner John Troupis and his son Bobby Troupis understand that food is not merely sustenance, but art and soul. In that spirit, they do their utmost to ensure that each customer's visit is a sensory experience.

"... a winning charm ..."

"... fresh fish, care with good products and little razzmatazz nudges Pantheon ahead of most competitors ..."

"As golden and desirable as an Olympic medal"

It's paid off. Pantheon has doubled in size since it opened and now offers two bright, spacious dining rooms. Semi-private dining with a comforting fireplace is available in the west room.

In a business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon's continuity stands out. The same head chef and most of the same wait staff present when it opened are still in place. People enjoy working here, they like the clientele, and the clientele likes them. Continuity and loyalty go hand in hand.

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. The Olympics happen every four years, but at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown, you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

Ingrained in the psyche of anyone born by the sea is that, from their own shore, they can go anywhere. Panthone's treatment of fresh fish — and every other item on its menu — will enhance that freedom feeling and transport your taste buds to worlds you never even knew existed.

"Because life has to be enjoyed" more than a slogan at MR. GREEK

More than any single factor, the heightened awareness and enjoyment of Mediterranean cuisine across Canada can be traced back to the pioneering efforts of MR. GREEK®.

By extrapolating the success of the flagship Danforth store into a nationwide chain bearing the word "Greek", founder George Raios blazed the trail for many other operators who have piggybacked on the share of mind he created. In recent years it has become fashionable even for continental restaurants to include "Mediterranean" dishes on their menu.

Voted "Best Greek Restaurant" 15 years in a row

Raios is okay with that. Having created a national brand identity and consistent standard of excellence for Greek cuisine, he's far too busy leading the way to look back at who's following.

Nor has he rested on his evolutionary laurels. He also undertook to revolutionize the way Greek food is prepared and perceived.

"'Revolutionized' is a strong statement," he says. "'Back to basics' might be more accurate. In its original pristine state, the Mediterranean diet is among the healthiest known to man. Our forefathers used the purest and freshest ingredients. So do we. They did not add chemicals or preservatives. Neither do we."

Old-fashioned, healthy home cooking has always been a core concept for Greek restaurants but "we wanted to ensure that in our case, the reference to 'health' was supported with facts. Our customers can enjoy any item on our menu in the knowledge that at MR. GREEK, great taste and good health go hand in hand."

The facts are that MR. GREEK uses only trans-fat-free oils and adds no MSG or preservatives.

mrgreek.com • mrgreekcatering.com

This includes their MSG-free traditional and Chicken Gyros, made according to their own exclusive recipe. They serve the freshest fish, prepared traditionally and grilled to perfection. Their chicken souvlaki is made of 100% chicken breasts.

And MR. GREEK is one of the few Greek restaurants — if not the only one — to detail the nutritional content of its menu on its website.

And how has this commitment translated into customer satisfaction? MR. GREEK has won the Toronto Sun Readers' Choice Award for Best Greek Restaurant 15 years in a row!

Together with the quality of ingredients, rigorous compliance standards at every operational level ensure that your sit-down dinner, take-out, delivery or catering order has the same exquisite taste at MR GREEK Aurora, MR GREEK Richmond Hill — or any other location — as at MR. GREEK Danforth.

For members of the MR. GREEK team, a warm, service-oriented approach is not just an asset, it's a prerequisite. You are greeted with a smile and treated in style whether you're ordering a quick bite or sitting down to a family dinner. "We're not just inviting you into our restaurant, we're welcoming you into our home," says Raios.

Your MR. GREEK experience might begin with a freshly tossed Greek Salad, dressed with MR. GREEK's signature vinaigrette — a tempting combination of fresh tomato, cucumbers, kalamata olives, feta cheese, iceberg and romaine lettuce. Among the main courses, you'll find MR. GREEK's expertly grilled souvlaki deserving of its reputation as 'Canada's favourite'. Moussaka is carefully prepared with a traditional recipe that would make any Bubie proud. The

Mission statement is more than an advertising slogan

Taverna Chicken is magnificently moist with sealed-in juices. Lamb "Arnaki" Fournou — lamb shank slow roasted in its own juices — is so tender you won't even need to use a knife. For a change of pace, try a Mediterranean-inspired pasta, seafood dish or a Certified Angus Beef® Ribeye or Striploin steak.

A perfect ending is the fresh-daily baklava — thin, crispy phyllo layers sandwiched with toasted nuts, honey and a hint of cinnamon.

MR. GREEK's mission statement, 'Because life has to be enjoyed', is more than an advertising slogan, says Raios. "Being part of our team means living up to that affirmation by ensuring that every customer enjoys their visit to the fullest. We guarantee it."

What gives him the most pleasure, he says, is enabling increasing numbers of people to discover the joys of Mediterranean cuisine. "Everyone deserves the experience of dining in a Greek home. I'm proud of the fact that we have shared that experience with as many people as possible. We look forward to sharing it with many more."

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Greek guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

MESSINI AUTHENTIK GYROS

445 DANFORTH

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $9.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

Search for perfect burger stops at Burger Stomper

Burger lovers are a nostalgic bunch. Their favourite food is more than food: it's a pop cultural icon evocative of '50s diners and teenage love.

Two such burgerphiles — partners Nick and John — brought a Big Idea to the quest for the perfect hamburger. They created the perfect device to create the perfect burger. The Burger Stomper — the only two-in-one hamburger press on the market — was born.

It wasn't an overnight process. Many brainstorming sessions were required. In terms of R & D, their research consisted of field work (taste-testing countless burgers across North America), and developing a prototype to improve on the varieties they sampled.

Thanks to its patented stick-free technology, the Burger Stomper tool presses perfectly-formed patties, every time, in five seconds flat. It can be purchased online at amazon.com. An impressive demonstration video can be viewed at www.burgerstomper.com.

This radical new device has earned Nick and John not only a five star rating in virtually every burger fanatic's book, but also an appearance on an upcoming episode of CBC's Dragon's Den.

Instore at 364 Danforth, an immaculate open kitchen is fronted by an urban high-tech / rustic low-tech duet of gleaming stainless steel and barn board. It's a fresh new environment in which to enjoy a fresh new take on burgers.

"We loved hamburgers too much to open just another burger joint," says John. "We wanted to elevate the burger to its rightful place in the pantheon of alltime great foods."

That meant giving burger lovers a compromise-free product. Says Nick, "It can be 'fast food' if you want it to be, but it is not junk food. It's not a meal you "settle for". It's healthy food with premium ingredients at a mainstream price. We use only Triple A premium hormone-free and antibiotic-free beef, ground daily and never frozen. No fillers, no binders — ever."

You can taste the difference quality makes; these burgers flat-out rock. All vaneties of cheese used are real, not processed. The fries are hand-cut from russet potatoes, the individually-battered onion rings crisper than a Wayne Gretzky pass.

And what's a burger without its running mate — the milkshake? Try the Peanut Butter Nutella: it's paradise in a glass.

The Classic Burger ($5.75) or Cheese Please ($8.50, including a disk of carmelized cheese) will satisfy a ravenous appetite. For over-the-top indulgence, the Secret Stomp ($11.50) towers with experimental and off-menu toppings like gravy stuffed onion rings. You tell them what toppings you don't want — then watch them build you a masterpiece.

Other menu items such as salads and grilled chicken sandwiches are planned, but it's the burgers that are bringing in clients in droves, and they will remain the focal point.

And the exclamation point.

"Using a hamburger press is a great way to make sure all your patties [are] cooked evenly throughout. But it can be frustrating and messy to remove the patty from the mold. Not so with the Burger Stomper. When we tested the stainless steel tool, beef patties easily fell off of the end of the Stomper every time."

Astoria grows the brand one satisfied customer at a time

Those of us outside the restaurant industry might see its business and culinary aspects as two different worlds. But they're not as disparate as they might seem, says Astoria's President Peter Kerasiotis.

In growing its brand, Astoria has researched and sourced new locations with the same care and attention to detail as the chefs who fastidiously select the fresh ingredients for your lunch and dinner.

"Hand picking", says Kerasiotis. "We're not a fast food restaurant charting growth by how many franchises we can open in a year. We measure our success by customer satisfaction, one meal at a time."

Astoria's second location, in Mississauga, was years in the planning. "Our philosophy about adding infrastructure is that it's permanent," says Kerasiotis. "We have no intention of adding a location to 'try it out'. It's not a dress rehearsal."

"Astoria is an institution. We knew that opening a second store was a huge step. But we would never dilute our brand. The overwhelmingly positive response to Astoria Mississauga was our green light to entertain opportunities for further expansion, which brought us to Newmarket."

Ambience must feel as good as the numbers look

Astoria does extensive market research of any new location opportunity. If the data indicate a market is propitious, onsite visits follow to determine if the neighbourhood and ambience "feel" as good as the numbers look. "Number crunching is important, but it only tells you part of the story," says Kerasiotis. "The site has to feel like a place we'd want to bring our own family for dinner."

The truth is, Astoria receives a steady stream of offers from major shopping centres, smart centres and strip plazas seeking anchor tenants. "We could easily be up to a dozen locations by now but that's not our m.o. We take our time, we do it right or not at all."

While retaining the welcoming Mediterranean ambience of the GreekTown location, the Mississauga store sports a distinctly different decor. The same will be true of the Newmarket location when it opens this fall. "Any art critic knows a cheap reproduction from the original. It's the same with food. You don't take a brand with a 40-year history of success and cookie-cutter it."

Lifelong Astoria customers, he says, have developed such a proprietary relationship with Astoria that "they consider it theirs — and it is. Their loyalty and support over four decades gives them an ownership stake. It may not be on paper, but as a bond and a partnership it carries equal weight. Everything that's been done has been done with our customers in mind, and in response to their wishes."

Creating a new dining environment for every store means higher architectural fees, but it's consistent with Astoria's uncompromising approach. "We prepare our dining environments like we prepare our meals — from scratch, with the finest ingredients."

Family comes first at Astoria; the sacred nature of food and the dining ritual is always front of mind. Quality rules: Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki are a welcome prelude to your feast, if you can keep your Astoria-induced souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

New generations of Greek food lovers with increasingly sophisticated palates have prompted many restaurants to overhaul their menus. Astoria has resisted sweeping changes in favour of subtle tweaks, while retaining the favourite dishes beloved by young and old alike. If it ain't broke, don't fix it; Astoria's souvlaki, moussaka and grilled fresh fish taste as good today as they did four decades ago. It's hard to improve on perfection.

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that Greek food's continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

"Best of the City"

Toronto Life

Some old customers for whom the Danforth location will always be the Mother Ship nevertheless enjoy dining at Astoria Mississauga when business or pleasure take them there. Newmarket means even more of Astoria to love. Its growth is like having a favourite relative in another city: something to look forward to when you travel.

The Newmarket location will have its own unique character. The only thing it will replicate is "the best family dining experience money can buy. And that will never change," says Kerasiotis. "You can update your décor and your menus, but the bottom line is the quality of food your put on your guest's plate. Our customers bring a very high set of expectations to our table. Only one group of people I know has higher expectations and that's us."

In GreekTown, Mississauga and soon Newmarket, it's an approach that suits Astoria's customers just fine.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Mezes inspires everyone — including Greeks

In the restaurant business, people from your own ethnic group or geographic area are often your harshest critics. If you were weaned on Mediterranean cuisine from the age of four — and home-cooked Greek specialties have been the staples of your diet through adolescence into adulthood — it's probably going to take an exceptional meal to elicit your praise.

If every bite you take becomes a comparison test with your mother's home cooking, guess which "contestant" is liable to be declared the winner?

The common-sense approach is to relax and enjoy your meal on its own merits, without endlessly comparing it to Mom's.

But some people just can't help themselves.

Mom may not follow them everywhere, but their "Mommy Barometer" does.

It's the yardstick against which they measure everything they eat.

These picky people are easy to spot — or hear. "The lamb chops are great. Not as good as Mom's, of course." "The moussaka is excellent. Other than Mom's...it's the best I've ever had." And so on.

For most restaurants, this type of customer is the least desirable. Who wants to be held up to an impossible standard? The least discriminating clients are always the easiest to please.

But Mezes isn't most restaurants.

Mezes doesn't shy away from such comparisons, they welcome them.

They're not worried about you bringing your "Mommy Barometer" because they're too busy using their own. They share your lofty standards.

So if you have a friend from Greece, Spain, Israel — or any Mediterranean country — who's skeptical about a restaurant's ability to measure up to their ideals — Mezes is the place to bring them.

The reaction can be amazing.

Recently, we witnessed a Greek expatriate who had never set foot in Mezes — a diehard "Mommy Barometer" guy — sigh rapturously when he tasted the Lamb Chops. We waited with baited breath for his verdict. Would he give them the A Plus they obviously deserved? Or would he understate his satisfaction with a B Minus?

"Perfect" was all he was able to utter.

If you dine regularly at Mezes, you know that this reaction isn't rare; it's common.

Here, they treat food with consummate respect. The mere act of serving it is a sacred trust. Mezes pays top dollar for all their ingredients to ensure you enjoy the best of everything. But that added expense is not reflected in their prices.

"Our customers can taste the difference freshness and quality make. We believe in rewarding them for that, not penalizing them," says proprietor Sue Zindros.

When you come to Mezes, be prepared to explore Greek cuisine as you never have before.

The consistent excellence menu-wide makes it difficult to pick favourites here, so most customers start by ordering a large assortment of appetizers. They're all first-rate, but don't just fall back on old favourites like hummous and tzatziki; no visit to GreekTown is complete without sampling Mezes' Gigantes and Dolmades. When it comes time to order your entree — if you can manage to get through the cornucopia of mezes — there's an equally compelling array of home-cooked meat, poultry, fish and vegetarian specialties to tempt your palate.

Mezes offers one of the most extensive Greek wine portfolios not just in Toronto, but nationwide, and can recommend the ideal accompaniment to your meal.

Since the Mezes first opened its doors, it has distinguished itself not only by an unwavering commitment to excellence, but also by recognizing that the simple pleasure of enjoying a meal with friends and family isn't just one of life's important things.

It's life itself.

Ouzeri: Danforth's most relaxed dining

A splash of vibrant colour, sweeping sky-blue awnings, and a festive patio beckon you inside. Open, airy, and spacious, Ouzeri breathes relaxation like no other restaurant. It's beaches and boardwalks without the sand. The gentle breeze that wafts through the main dining area caresses your cheeks with sealike serenity.

Many fine GreekTown restaurants have patios, but on a sunny day Ouzeri feels like it's all patio. Its innate summery spirit makes it a favourite year-round destination of Mediterranean food lovers with an affinity for open spaces.

The resulting frame of mind enhances the enjoyment of your meal immeasurably. It's a better digestive aid than any enzyme.

Like their pride and joy, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis are bright, cheery, welcoming people whose love of the restaurant business comes with the ease and second nature of people born to it.

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ourzeri's eclectic menu is focused on quality, not volume — the kind of quality that will stir your fondest memories of home cooking. No Bubie would ever acknowledge the superiority of another maven's chicken soup, but Ouzeri's might push her to the brink of that unthinkable admission.

You'll maintain your lighter-than-air feeling as you sail through Ouzeri's appetizers, which are presented with fine-dining elegance. Among the entrées, you'll find mainstream choices and signature items prepared according to time-honoured family recipes. Strydia Ouzeri is topped with spinach, tomato, kaseri cheese and Ouzeri's special sauce, then baked to perfection. Lamb rosemary pie, offered in your choice of lamb shank and feta or chicken with a rosemary and mushroom sauce enveloped in filo, is warmly recommended. The moussaka — both meat and vegetarian — is as good as it gets in GreekTown, and the seafood richly deserves the "authentically Greek" label you'll encounter everywhere on the Danforth. Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Salmon, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

500A Danforth Ave. 416.778.0500

Ouzeri's extensive Greek wine list has a selection that will perfectly complement any of the entrées, or stand on its own as an after-work or after-dinner libation. The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs.

Whether you're looking for a quick bite or a long, pleasurable meal, Ouzeri's three levels of dining all convey the same message:

Relax. Relax. Relax.

At Zorba's, the best menu is no menu at all

Whether you're a connoisseur of Mediterranean cuisine or just acquiring a taste for it, deciding on your main course isn't always easy. Lingering over menus and salivating over options is a common indulgence, especially with Greek food and its plethora of choices.

At Zorba's, however, the decision-making process is pre-empted by the Katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking). You can ask for a menu, but regulars never do. Would you ask your mother for a menu?

Doing so won't elicit the same rebuke here as it would at home, but once you've sampled the Katsarola, you'll understand why Zorba's menus are superfluous — unless you're ordering a fresh salad, a shish kebob or hamburger and French fries for the kids.

The only real difference between Zorba's Katsarola and a home-cooked meal is selection. Patriarch and chef Kosta Carasoulos spends much of the day cooking to feed a bevy of regular guests who know a good "Mom" when they find one. The fruits of his labours are lovingly arrayed on a steam table. Today, there's lamb shank, lamb fricassee, roast chicken, roast potatoes, moussaka, pastitsio, gigantes, green beans with zucchini, carrots, cauliflower, okra, soup, and whatever else captures his fancy. Tomorrow? Only Carasoulos knows. There's no formal meal planning here, just well-honed culinary instincts — and a clientele whose taste buds respond better to these visual and aromatic stimuli than to a written rendering.

This is less a restaurant than a home kitchen feeding a huge extended family, of which you are now a de facto member. You can call ahead to see what's available, but why spoil the fun? Most of Zorba's customers just show up with an appetite and a smile.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once these mouthwatering homemade specialties are gone, they're gone. (You thought this was a restaurant?!) With an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, it's best to arrive early for best selection.

For the family that wants to dine in a laid-back atmosphere, Zorba's is a perfect fit. For anyone working to deadline, it's one of a very few restaurants capable of serving a home-cooked meal on a fast-food schedule.

The opportunity to enjoy such haymishe fare in a 20-minute window is priceless. Remember coming in from hockey or other childhood games to a hot meal, bolting it down and running out to play again before dark? Those idyllic days are gone, the rink or playground long since replaced by the workplace. But if there's a restaurant that revives that nurturing spirit, it's Zorba's.

The prices are modest, to say the least. Rarely will you enjoy so much food for so little. That may explain why during the week, the take-out lineup sometimes rivals the sit-down crowd. You just can't cook at home for less.

The service is courteous, but there are no grand formalities here — just the unassuming warmth of people who, like an old friend who never changes, are always easy to be with.

Zorba's is a throwback — a welcome antidote to the inexorable march of time.

Select Bakery a Perfect 10 to cakewatchers

We're not talking about a beauty pageant here — though as bakeries go, Select's regal air is crown-worthy. And, pageant-like, not only Greece but numerous other countries are represented in its array of exquisite pastries, either by their traditional classics or close variations thereof.

What we're talking about is the 10th anniversary of a bakery now celebrating a decade-long reign of excellence in GreekTown. Select set a new standard when it opened its doors and has steadily raised the bar ever since.

Like many of the storied bakeries of Europe, Select oozes opulence on a grand scale. But it operates with the intimacy of a close-knit family business. The Katsamatis family — father Emmanuel, sons Kosta and Nick, and daughter Ereti — lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs.

Select is easy to find, greeting you at 405 Donlands just south of O'Connor. The problem isn't access, it's egress — getting out without buying half the store. You may come for a birthday cake, but odds are you'll leave with a Galaktoboureko and some Loukoumades. Thought you'd just pop in, grab a loaf of European Village Bread, and duck out? Five minutes later you're inhaling the remains of your third chocolate-covered baklava, wondering what hit you.

Nor is Select's scope limited to the European specialties. You may not come here just for apple turnovers, but Select's are...well, a Perfect 10. It's rare for a bakery with such variety to hit all the right notes across its full selection, but if you linger for a few minutes over a coffee and watch the staff at work in their open kitchen, you'll get a sense of the commitment that's being made to achieve this level of excellence.

In addition to its baked goods, Select offers terrific prepared foods. Moussaka, pastitsio, and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are made fresh daily. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles.

Specialty cakes are always fresh and can be inscribed on a moment's notice, though it's best to order more elaborate creations in advance.

How elaborate?

No king or queen ever had access to a finer team of artisans than you do at Select. A week's notice is preferred, but if real-world demands scuttle your best-laid plans, Select is up to the challenge. "Presentation has become almost as important as taste and texture," says Kosta Katsamatis. "Anyone planning a wedding these days is looking for the 'Wow' factor in all phases of the meal, especially the cake. It's the Grande Finale. It has to look amazing, not only to impress your guests, but also because, after the wedding dress, it's the most-photographed item at the wedding reception." When your artistry shines under the scrutiny of 8 megapixels (and that's just the kids with their iPhones, never mind the professionals), you know you've earned the "Perfect 10" crown.

Tight timelines create pressure, but Select can take the heat. "Just because we have less time to prepare doesn't mean you're prepared to accept less," grins Katsamatis. "We understand that. We're happy to relieve you of that pressure."

To those of us for whom an affinity to the local bakery was an integral part of growing up, Select keeps the back-home feeling alive. As it enters its second decade, Select rekindles our fondest memories with every bread, cake and pasty it bakes.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Culinary art worthy of the Louvre at Pappas: new masterpieces created fresh daily

"The art of Mediterranean cuisine" is a ubiquitous phrase in culinary circles. For Pappas Grill it's doubly relevant.

In 1988, founders Bill and Meropi Klianis were sourcing a new location for their art gallery (Williams Gallery at Yonge and Eglinton) when they stumbled on a sprawling space in the heart of GreekTown. Too large and too ambitious for their small gallery — but too loaded with restaurant potential to pass up — the serendipitous space wooed the Klianis family from one art form to another.

A lengthy and painstaking transformation ensued under the direction of architect Robert Chan of Hirschberg Design Group, with considerable input from Bill and Meropi. The breathtaking result instantly captured the fancy of a dining public eager for an eclectic departure from traditional Greek menus.

"We didn't want to open just another Greek restaurant"

"We didn't want to open just another Greek restaurant," says daughter Jane Klianis, who with brother John now oversees all of the restaurant's day-to-day operations. "There was no point in duplicating what was already being done by our neighbours." In the art world, if you bring nothing new to the table, you're either uninspired or a copycat. Clearly, the Klianis family's art experience transmuted to their restaurant ethos.

Pappas' winning mix of elegant Mediterranean dining in an airy, light-filled, tri-level dining room has captivated GreekTown goers since Day One, not only for the quality of its cuisine but also for its unique ability to adapt to any occasion or mood. It's fine dining, yet casual and relaxed. It affords privacy, yet provides sweeping sightlines. It's the epicentre of GreekTown activity — letting the outside in like a beautifully landscaped public square disguised as a restaurant — yet it's a secluded shelter in which to pause and reflect.

Jane and John keep close tabs on all aspects of the business, but are careful not to micromanage — especially with their chefs. "Artistic people need artistic license," smiles Jane. "If you take away their freedom, you stultify their creativity. We buy market fresh ingredients every day, give them to our chefs, and tell them to make something wonderful."

The result is always novel and often spectacular, she says. "Our customers look to us for new taste experiences. That doesn't mean changing the menu every six months, it means creating a complete new set of dinner specials every week."

These take the form of a seven-day Prix Fixe menu which revitalizes your palate without devitalizing your portfolio. $25 gets you a choice of hot or cold soup, two appetizers, and four entrées. That's exceptional value for any fine restaurant, let along one that racks up awards like others rack lamb.

Pappas Grill

440 Danforth Avenue
www.pappasgrill.com

Speaking of this Mediterranean staple, there's more care and attention to detail in Pappas' Oven-Roasted Lamb Shank than in some entire menus we've seen. Slow roasted for eight hours in Greek oregano, fresh garlic and spices, it stews longer in its own juices than your mother-in-law after a put-down of her cooking. The Pappas Rigatoni (spicy homemade Greek sausage, sweet peppers and garlic with feta, parmesan and kefalotiri cheese in a rich white wine cream sauce) has seen more than one Italian chef add Opa! to his vocabulary. The Mediterranean Shrimp sautéed in white wine is a seafood revelation.

Pappas cooks most of its dishes in extra-virgin olive oil, but the extra cost of this and other premium ingredients like white wine is not reflected in its prices. "Using fresh, pure ingredients isn't a "bonus," says Jane, "it's standard. You don't like a contractor cutting corners on your house; we don't cut corners in creating your meal."

All Pappas' dishes are made fresh from scratch on the premises. No MSG, additives or preservatives are used — ever. "Mediterranean cuisine in its pure state is intrinsically healthy," says Klianis. "We keep it that way."

Ditto for the Saturday and Sunday continental Brunch, where you can enjoy eggs in any style imaginable. Try the three-egg Omelette Onassis filled with artichokes, topped with smoked salmon, drizzled with avgolemono dill sauce, and served with Greek salad.

"Our customers look to us for new taste experiences"

Fame may be fleeting, but not at Pappas Grill. If so, its cameo appearance in My Big Fat Greek Wedding would be long forgotten. Truth is, Pappas' cuisine had made a lasting impression on the Toronto dining consciousness long before its foliated frontage lit up the silver screen.

Kaylvia too busy setting tables to set trends

In the restaurant industry, being known as a trend-setter can give your business a short-term boost. If you're lucky, restaurant-goers looking for a bandwagon to jump on will check you out and follow you on Twitter.

But how do you set trends when you're too busy setting tables?

How do you launch "the next great thing" when you've just served 40 platesfull of it — and have another 40 guests waiting?

When your restaurant is full of customers who already know what they like — and can't be swayed by stories about the "flavour of the month" — your name is probably Kalyvia.

What's great about Kalyvia is what's great about GreekTown. It's reliable. It's what you know and love. When a discussion of where to go for dinner turns into a debate — and you hear about this new trend or that new concept — you tune it out. Because in your mind, there's no debate.

The home cooking you'll find at Kalyvia has an enduring value that trends don't. It tastes as good today as it did 10 years ago — and as it will tomorrow.

Kalyvia's Tsafatinos family takes pride in preserving this legacy, but, like many Greek restauranteurs, they don't make a big deal about it. You might see a line or two about it in their menu, but no elaborate manifesto with a family tree of famous chefs descended from royalty.

""We try to let our cooking do the talking and leave the feedback to our customers," says Jimmy Tsafatinos.

Does this sound familiar? Our grandmother never told us how good her soup was. She may have asked if it was good ten times — and every time you said yes, she'd reply "Are you sure? Tell the truth!" You won't be subjected to this ritual at Kalyvia. They'll only ask you once.

WWW.KALYVIA.COM

In GreekTown, competition is collegial and congenial. Says Jimmy: "We're happy to be one of many good restaurants with something to offer. We work together to create a family environment, an area that everyone will enjoy coming to. One night they might eat here, the next night at our neighbour's. As long as they come to GreekTown, we're happy."

Kalyvia has always given GreekTown-goers plenty of reasons to choose them. Their main dining room affords comfort and privacy, and is a great spot for milestone events. Their lively patio is always in demand. Dining in? Their take-out orders receive the same care and attention to detail as their sit-down dining, and they offer local delivery.

The Tsafatinos' home town of Kalyvia is one of some 10 Greek villages bearing that same name. If you were doing a PhD thesis on Greek village cooking, a comparative study of the 10 Kalyvias would make for interesting fodder. Your findings would no doubt give rise to lively debate, at least among Kalyvians. Good luck getting any one of those towns to admit that their food isn't the best, smiles Tsafatinos.

And which Kalyvia's cooking is the best, in his humble opinion?

"I can't tell a lie," he grins. "It's ours."

Now this is a rivalry we can get with — a tasting competition in which no one takes themselves too seriously, and the customer always wins.

Exactly as it should be.

At Pan "love fills up a small space very quickly"

Food with flavour speaks to the palate; food prepared with respect and served with love speaks to the soul. Of GreekTown's many fine restaurants, none engages in this dialogue more passionately than Pan.

Large enough to accommodate a party of 75 — but small enough for candlelight intimacy — it's your mother's kitchen transposed to a Greek island.

It's everything that a chain restaurant isn't. Its menu is not a "catch-all"; it's a limited-edition collection of culinary gems.

This focus doesn't mean lack of selection. It simply means that no item is on the menu merely to fill a slot. "We don't serve assembly-line food," says Chris Christodoulou. "We make to order, with our own signature style. Our chef will prepare your food as if you were guests in his own home."

And present it regally. The subtext here is individuality. Take Pan's Rack Of Lamb, for example. Finished in a walnut basil oil dressing, served with artichokes and leeks in a fresh herb fricassee over feta scalloped potatoes, its rendition is uniquely Pan's. Ditto for the Santorini Chicken, Caria Lemon Roasted Chicken and Stuffed Jumbo Quail, perennial mainstays of Pan's menu.

Fish and seafood lovers are gratified by an eclectic selection that includes Rhodes Shrimp (sautéed onions, garlic and feta, in a white wine lemon dill cream sauce, served with garlic sautéed spinach over monastiri orzo pasta).

Pan's dining environment has more cachet per inch than a charm school. But its unique ambience is no secret. So reservations are always a good idea, especially for Friday and Saturday night, when live music and belly dancing are featured.

Chris and Soula Christodoulou are blissfully content with their diminutive digs. "Most of us grew up in small homes," says Chris. "But love fills up a small space very quickly. There's always room for one more at the kitchen table."

You won't have to share your table at Pan, but the foregoing metaphor still resonates with those of us reared on "old-school" sharing. Our grandparents — or parents — didn't know from monster homes. They just knew how to give us everything they had to give, in a home whose grandeur was measured by the size of their hearts.

Pan doesn't just serve Mediterranean food, they bring it to life. In an inviting enclave where there's always room for one more at the "kitchen table."

Caffé Demetre's homemade iced cream hits right note for Streisand

You're strolling the Danforth, minding your own business. Suddenly, you're being served a Life Sentence Belgian waffle with Peanut Butter Overload iced cream, topped with bananas, fudge brownie, fudge and peanuts.

You're now just another inmate "doing time" at Caffé Demetre — swallowed up by a vortex of splits, sundaes, bowls, cones, crêpes and waffles, with an irresistible common denominator: the best iced cream you've ever tasted.

Made the old-fashioned way with no additives or preservatives

Relax; it's a crime so common that the dessert emporium sells "over 2000 litres of iced cream a week" in peak season, according to founder Gary Theodore. The fact that it's home-made the old-fashioned way (no additives, no preservatives) reduces somewhat the guilt of this unbelievably pleasurable indulgence.

(By the way, iced cream is not a typo. Caffé Demetre uses this centuries-old term as a reminder that all of its iced cream is made freshly on the premises at each of its 11 GTA locations).

You've served your life sentence, but there's no rest for the wicked. It's time for a Stormy Weather Frappé: a frosty and thick blend of European coffee, caramel, milk, ice, Honey Vanilla Iced Cream, served in a tall fudge and caramel striped glass, topping with fresh whipped cream and caramel drizzle. This year-round favourite puts any frappuccino to shame. All Demetre's beverages — from freshly brewed conventional coffee (40 varieties) to cappuccino, frappés, steamers, and espressos — are top-drawer.

The espresso is a case in point. Caffé Demetre now uses the latest "grind on demand" technology to ensure that the beans are 100% freshly ground for each order, with no loss of vital aromas or flavours. They also offer a great Decaf Espresso for patrons who don't want caffeine late at night. All espresso drinks are served with mini-almond biscotti.

What a place to pop the big question! Sweeten up your prey with a Sweetcar Named Devour crêpe (Chocolatta Iced Cream, fresh strawberries, and fudge sauce). And get the ring ready.

Now that you've enjoyed the main course, it's time for dessert...

caffé Demetre®
400 Danforth Avenue
www.waycoolcafe.com

Caffé Demetre is one of the few iced cream parlours in North America where you can still enjoy banana splits and other iced cream desserts the way your parents and grandparents did. Since opening in 1989, they have honoured that tradition by adhering rigorously to its original iced cream recipe; it's difficult to improve on perfection.

Maintaining this kind of quality doesn't come easily. Here, even fresh daily doesn't cut it. At Demetre's, the iced cream is made virtually on demand, so that it always arrives at your table freshly-made.

The original recipe, like the original (and recently renovated) Caffé Demetre, was borne of Theodore's passion for ice-cream making. Many young entrepreneurs today buy into a slick business "concept" and learn their trade after the fact. Not Theodore. He spent years studying and honing his craft before opening the first Caffé Demetre. "I wanted to perfect my recipe before sharing it with the public."

But Demetre's is much more than an iced cream parlour. Their crêpes and Belgian waffles are made according to the same exacting standards and with the same premium fresh ingredients, as are the sauces drizzled over desserts too numerous to name, one more mouthwatering than the next. This is not a place for self-restraint. The good news is, the quality and freshness of the ingredients allows you to indulge without experiencing the annoying, cloyingly sweet aftertaste common to many commercial desserts.

And Theodore is quick to differentiate between discipline and denial. "We all have cravings. Indulging them is part of enjoying life. Discipline is treating yourself to the real McCoy. Denial is forcing yourself to do without it entirely."

What often happens in the latter case, he says, is that you'll either (a) eat a low-fat or low-cal substitute, which fails to satisfy and only intensifies your craving, or (b) when the unreasonably-suppressed craving resurfaces, you'll grab the nearest nosh — often a packaged product full of chemicals. Now you feel doubly guilty: you've not only sinned, you've done so with a substitute. Whither satisfaction?

If you're on a diet, you should either not come here or resolve to be good to yourself when you do. If the iced cream doesn't get you, the crêpes and Belgian waffles will. Saying no to Moo La La is like turning down a date with Brad Pitt. Nutello Chip Iced Cream drizzled with Nutella® Sauce and garnished with Sliced Bananas and Roasted Hazelnuts....Yeah right. Like we're going to say no to that.

Fortunately, there are enough iced cream connoisseurs — and regular folk who realize it's good for your psyche to say Yes once in a while — to keep Demetre's hopping.

Goes down as smoothly and sweetly as a Streisand melody

Nor are those afficionados shy about sharing their thoughts. Take Barbara Streisand for example. During an ACC concert tour, she told audiences she loved the iced cream she'd enjoyed at the original Caffé Demetre on the Danforth. Theodore couldn't have been happier if she'd sung for him personally. Clearly, she of the mellifluous voice has good taste in iced cream.

At Caffé Demetre, even a casual dessert becomes an event, making it a natural for parties and impromptu celebrations. Want to be an instant hero? Bring the children for their next birthday. If things get out of hand, Demetre's understands. No child surrounded by all these goodies can be expected to control his parents.

The menu sets a festive tone with a rainbow of colours and playfully-named specialties, like The Cold And The Beautiful, From Here To Maternity, Slice Capades, and A Cake Walk. Ten original iced cream flavours (including White Chocolate, an all-time favourite) and a dozen or so specialty iced cream desserts offer infinite possibilities.

Despite Caffé Demetre's popularity, Theodore and his team remain well-grounded. "You're only as good as your last batch of iced cream," he says. "You can taste the difference quality makes, and we will never compromise that — ever."

Sweet music to an iced cream lover's ears.

Big Carrot certified by Ecocert Canada: over 700 products and counting

If you have a favourite store that gives you great service, you tend to keep shopping there — especially when part of that service is the expert advice needed to make an informed purchase. The Big Carrot has become that destination store for an entire generation, and its customers have reciprocated with a level of loyalty unparalleled in the retail food business.

If you shop at The Big Carrot, you'll understand why it doesn't "feel" quite like any other store: it isn't. It's businesslike, but in no way "corporate"; the personal touch is ever-present. Because it's a worker-owned co-op, its members have an all-for-one and one-for-all attitude and never lose sight of the big picture: putting the customer first.

Ironically, in exemplifying the qualities typically associated with a small business, The Big Carrot has gotten bigger. Three separate expansions in the past 11 years have seen it almost double in space. Metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living offers you much to enjoy.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market; a holistic dispensary; and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar. It caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, non-GMO. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

The Big Carrot is as passionate about engaging its community around food issues as it is about selling the best food available. As one of the founding members of the Non-GMO Project, a non-profit organization committed to preserving and building sources of non-GMO products and providing verified non-GMO choices, The Big Carrot continues to be at the forefront of the non-GMO movement. In addition, The Big Carrot also partners regularly with the Canadian Biotechnology Action Network (CBAN).

Due to CBAN's ongoing efforts, 2012 brought about the victory over "enviropig" when the hog industry group Ontario Pork conceded to public pressure and stopped funding GM pig research at the University of Guelph. The university is now closing down its active research and ending its breeding program of GM pigs. The Big Carrot is proud of its active role in this victory. The latest campaign to create a buzz is the fight against GM Alfalfa. The campaign is centered around an animated short video titled "Queen of the Pasture" featuring two Big Carrot staff members. The educational video is used to raise awareness about the threat of genetically modified alfalfa in our food system.

The Big Carrot was one of Canada's first retailers to certify to the new Canadian Organic standard, underscoring its 28-year commitment to good organic stewardship. Ecocert Canada has certified The Big Carrot to process and package over 700 organic products in its juice bar, bulk, spice, cheese and produce departments.

Retailer certification is not required by the CFIA, but at The Big Carrot it is seen as an important part of preserving the integrity of the entire supply chain. "We see our certification as our responsibility, to both our producers and our customers, to ensure that the hard work of the organic farmer is being preserved," notes Big Carrot Standards coordinator Maureen Kirkpatrick.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher-certified — or a combination thereof. Rudi's organic Kosher breads have been a hit for their incredible flavour and moisture.

Other Kosher-certified products, to name but a few: Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Amy's soups, pizzas and frozen entrées; Enjoy Life Nut and Gluten Free Cereals, Cookies and Snack Bars; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods.

The Big Carrot's inhouse vegetarian deli offers 50 in-house certified organic dishes, baked goods and desserts daily. Toronto's only organic juice bar offers over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as Grab & Go sandwiches & salads plus other treats.

The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. It also demonstrates its environmental friendliness by heating its water tank by solar panels.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

Each meal a new chapter in favourite book

How does a small, owner-operated restaurant enjoy 18 years of success in an era of ever-increasing competition and ever-shrinking budgets?

And how does it build a clientele so loyal, they could almost find their way to Avli blindfolded?

And now is it that of the many Mediterranean restaurants that opened in the GTA in the mid 1990s, Avli is one of the few still standing? (Here's a hint: owner/chef Lambrinos Vassiliou hasn't sat down since the opening).

This is an exaggeration, of course, but the metaphor is not far from the truth. Cooking with inspiration means being quick on your feet. It means drawing every bit of flavour out of market-fresh ingredients to create dishes that will inspire your customers. It means treating each dish like an original work of art.

"A meal is like a stage play," says Lambrinos. "If the theatre troupe is talented, you can expect an inspiring performance. But the show will not always be identical. The inflections and emotions will change slightly from one performance to the next. The actors are not following a formula."

"We operate the same way. I don't call myself an artist but I can tell you that, even with my favourite recipes, each meal is unique. This is not paint by numbers."

Lambrinos may not call himself an artist, but the critics do. Sara Waxman's "food that is poetry" tribute is probably one of the best compliments ever paid a restaurant.

Many dishes on Avli's menu elicit rapturous praise. The signature pies (Seafood, Rabbit & Spring Onion, Lamb, and Chicken Mushroom), with their hand-brushed olive-oil crust, are unsurpassed in the genre.

Avli's core group of discerning guests have remained loyal not only because of consistent quality but also because each visit takes them to new levels of enjoyment. For them, each meal adds a new chapter to their favourite book.

"Our relationships are all we've got"

Dine at any of the Danforth's fine family restaurants and chances are you'll not only enjoy a hearty meal but also witness a positive family dynamic in action.

For Allen Fraser, Psychotherapist and Counsellor, positive family dynamics aren't just a by-product of his business. They are his business.

Allen Fraser
MSW, RSW

Located in the bustling Carrot Common, Fraser draws on 38 years of experience in family counselling to help clients improve the quality of their relationships — and their lives.

Fraser's practice covers the full spectrum of relationship issues, as well as grief and bereavement counselling. His clients include couples dealing with marital issues, parents and children seeking a middle ground — anyone who has reached the point of acknowledging that they need help.

Fraser's byline is "Learning to let go of holding on." It's one that resonates with his clients — and is easier said than done.

"Most people can visualize themselves relaxing and letting go," says Fraser. "In practice, however, it means letting go of weeks, months, often years of hurt, anger, resentment, cynicism, jealousy...all the negative emotions that, when left unchecked, can become so ingrained that they are second nature. They're like a second skin that cannot be shucked off; it has to be shed gradually."

"People rarely see a counsellor as a proactive measure," he says. "By the time they make an appointment, they've usually been mired in a conflictual behaviour pattern for a long time. We'd all like the therapist to wave a magic wand and give us an epiphany from which we emerge in perfect harmony. But generally speaking, anything that takes a long time to break down takes time to build up again."

Making the initial appointment is an important first step, says Fraser. "Once you've passed the denial stage and accepted that if you could fix the problem yourself you would have done so already, you can begin the healing process in earnest."

Typically, the first meeting is spent defining the problem or problems that require resolution. Subsequent sessions enable client and therapist to explore the issues in greater depth, identify the root cause(s), and develop a resolution strategy.

In his 38 years of practice, seeing clients in his office or in their home, Fraser has helped hundreds of individuals, couples and families strengthen their bonds, restore their faith in one another and themselves — and learn to "let go of holding on."

Where there's a will there's a way, says Fraser. "When both parties are coming from a good place and willing to work together to improve their relationship — and be patient with each other and themselves throughout that process — good things happen."

Too often, he says, people are forced to reconnect with their true feelings by a traumatic event. "One minute you're arguing with your spouse about a credit card purchase and the next minute you find out she has cancer. That money that was so important a minute ago? You'd gladly flush it down the toilet — along with the rest of your possessions — for the guarantee of her good health."

That doesn't mean you should go into therapy whenever you have an argument, says Fraser. It just means that "in today's fast-paced world, with all its pressures and stressors, it's easy to become jaded and accept a relationship decline as 'just life'. It isn't. A relationship you value is a relationship worth fixing."

"We should all stop ourselves from time to time and ask if the discord we're experiencing is what we want to feel 5 years from now or 10 years from now. Because 5 or 10 years from now isn't really 5 or 10 years, it's tomorrow. And tomorrow is already today in our minds."

"At the end of the day, our relationships are all we've got. We owe it to ourselves to make them the best they can be."

Allen Fraser can be reached at 416-698-8198 or on the web at www.allenfraser.com.

Pilaros TASTE OF THE DANFORTH

Healthy Planet's growing orbit brings vegetarian café, other delights to Danforth

The Danforth, already home to Toronto's highest concentration of health food stores and wellness practitioners, just got a major nutritional boost with the arrival of the Healthy Planet.

Situated at Danforth and Carlaw in the heart of GreekTown, this sparkling new emporium offers Danforth-goers the greatest selection of healthy food choices on the planet....er, in the Planet.

This is not just another health food store. It's big (5,000 square feet), bright, and features Fresh Planet Food — the Danforth's first vegetarian café with both indoor and dedicated outdoor patio seating.

Danforth's first vegetarian cafe with dedicated outdoor patio seating

Raw and vegetarian food lovers have been salivating since news of Fresh Planet Food first broke. Their enthusiasm is shared by Manager and Nutritionist Heidi Horowitz. "This store — and the opportunity to serve gourmet vegetarian food both indoors and out — has been years in the nurturing and planning."

The cafe offers a spectacular variety of vegetarian food options, including gluten free, dairy free, dehydrated and fermented foods; all of which are organic, heart healthy and nutrient dense.

Horowitz works hand in hand with 12-year veteran vegetarian Head Cook Pina Giuseppina. Food Director Andrew Muto, and a team of innovative raw food chefs.

Since The Healthy Planet's opening in early July, the response from GreekTown has exceeded their expectations. Says Manager Siddik Motala. "The Danforth has become a magnet for health-oriented providers and consumers. It was a natural fit for us. We needed a location that had enough space, a high profile, and patio seating. This is it."

The Healthy Planet carries every major brand name on the market in packaged and bottled goods, health and beauty products, vitamin, mineral and food supplements, and sports nutritional supplements. Less-known boutique brands also hit their shelves before they become famous. "We are constantly sourcing the marketplace for the best products, says Motala. "Our staff are well-educated and well-versed in the properties and advantages of each."

The sports nutrition section is gigantic — a small store in itself. The serious athlete or trainer will feel right at home here. It's all part of the Healthy Planet's one-stop shopping concept, says Motala. "Whether you're an expectant mother on a restricted diet, a hockey player who's been ordered to put on 10 pounds for the coming season, or a householder greening up your home environment with chemical-free cleaning products, you'll find everything you need right here."

And when you're done shopping, you can relax on the patio with a fresh salad and a tall, cool glass of organic juice. The café, says Horowitz, "is more than a place to grab a quick bite; it's a destination — a place to have a proper, sit-down meal in a relaxed environment."

To that end, Fresh Planet Food employs a full-time raw food chef who parlays the freshest produce, herbs and spices into the most exquisite gourmet vegetarian fare this side of heaven. It's not just "alternative cuisine" says Horowitz. "It's a whole new dining experience that will redefine your idea of freshness and flavor."

Scintillating salad choices on the summer menu include:

• Watermelon Arugula • Summer Root Slaw
• Moroccan Quinoa • Summer Sprouts
• Spicy Mango • Vegan Caesar
• Deep Green Medley

And six other locations to serve you

www.healthyplanetcanada.com

Included on the fall menu are:

• Porcini Mushroom & Pecan Vegan Paté
• Tuscan Bean Dip
• Winter Persimmon & Arugula
• Autumn Apple Squash
• Carrot Ginger Soup
• Arabian Spiced Roasted Autumn Vegetables
• Chocolate Covered Figs
• Warm Winter Fruits

In addition to salads, there are soups, Panini, fresh organic cheeses (both conventional and vegan), Vegan Tofu Burgers, and many more fresh-daily options. Their Spicy Baked Olives are the bomb.

They even serve breakfast here!

For lunch and dinner, you can build your own plate or enjoy Fresh Planet Food's "Grab & Go" meals priced as low as, or lower than, many conventional prepared meals.

Affordable pricing is intrinsic to the Healthy Planet's approach, says Horowitz. But quantity must always be measured against quality. "In absolute terms, organic food — and any food farmed with eco-friendly methods — is more expensive than conventional food. But in nutritional value relative to volume or weight, it's actually cheaper."

Some who try the Healthy Planet's gourmet delights for the first time may doubt that a small serving can satisfy their appetite. Yet the same people "come back raving about how that small portion kept them going all day."

But small portions are not mandatory. No one will look askance at you for loading up on carbs. "If you like bread or potatoes with your meal, by all means enjoy," says Horowitz. "But a fresh meal packed with nutrients does not need to be "padded."

You mean my fourth slice of organic chocolate cake qualifies as "padding?"

If this culinary genre sounds like a dieter's best friend, it is. Sensational taste and weight control, rarely uttered in the same sentence, are regular pen plans here, even at dessert. One fresh frozen yogurt parfait and one cappuccino later, you're still footloose and fancy free — and hundreds of calories under your quota.

Sensational taste and weight control at the same party

The Healthy Planet's sustainable purchasing practices favor locavorianism and in-season buying. All coffee and tea served in the café are Organic Fair Trade, and all take-out containers are biodegradable. The Healthy Planet is community-minded and supports worthy charities like the Canadian Celiac Association.

What began as a single-store operation in 1998 has grown to a seven-store juggernaut in 14 years, with plans for further expansion in the offing. A full-service web store with an informative blog is accessible 24/7.

The importance of a healthy lifestyle isn't new, says Horowitz. What is new is our heightened awareness of it. "When our grandparents told us Go in good health, they were onto something. We're finally listening."

Clinical studies have shown that not listening to Bubie and Zadie can be harmful to your health. At the Healthy Planet, they've been listening all along.

The Danforth's green space: a ribbon runs through it

With hundreds of fine restaurants and shops at your fingertips in GreekTown, it's easy to spend all your time on Danforth Avenue proper. But if you think that Withrow Park is the area's only green space, you're mistaken.

Most people enjoy a relaxing stroll after lunch or dinner, chatting and taking in GreekTown's many pleasant sights. If you venture just half a block north of the Danforth between Chester and Woodycrest Avenues, however, you'll discover a mini "green belt" of parkettes and Green P lots connecting those two streets in an almost unbroken ribbon.

The sheer number of lots and their proximity to Danforth Avenue can save you time no matter where you park. If you're habitually tardy, it also minimizes the embarrassment of being late for your dinner date or appointment.

The parkettes are no secret to the locals. On a pleasant day, you'll find mothers strolling their babies or young children (who enjoy the play area in the Carlaw Avenue Parkette at left), elderly folk relaxing on a bench, and people of all ages using this."green gateway" to move from A to B expeditiously.

Coupled with the area's canopy of mature trees, the nicely landscaped parkettes and their gently winding paths provide a quiet oasis.

Top secret report from 569 Danforth reveals (oo

"Hello Mr. Smith. This is Saul Korman."

Most business owners don't call qualified job applicants — let alone unqualified — unless they're selected.

But most business owners aren't Saul Korman.

"... Thank you for sending me your application; I appreciate it. I'm afraid we can't hire you because you have no experience in the clothing business. But thanks for thinking of us, and best of luck. Call me back if you have any questions."

Someone obviously forgot to tell Korman that hiding behind voice mail is the norm today. Not only doesn't he hide from it, he'll grab the phone on the second ring if you don't get it on the first.

"If someone cares enough to write me a letter, then I care enough to reply." But his attentiveness goes beyond reciprocation. He's fascinated by people. "Everyone has a story. I listen. I learn."

At this rate, by the time his 70th anniversary rolls around, he'll have the shmatah business down pat.

Korry's is the suit store, to be sure. Thousands of well-dressed customers in the GTA and beyond are living proof. But if it's the quality of the garment that bring men to his door, it's the quality of the experience that sees them leave better dressed than when they came.

How does a clothing store continue to grow and flourish for 60 years? According to Korman, customer care is the #1 reason.

In the final analysis, excellent point-of-sale service is as important as the quality of your merchandise — perhaps more important, says Saul. "When you buy a great suit and you get great service, you may remember the service more than the suit. If you get bad service, you'll shop somewhere else next time no matter how good the suit is."

Continues son Shawn, "Anyone who comes in our door has picked us. Even if they're only browsing, they've chosen our store to browse in. We never take that for granted."

Korry's spends a small fortune on radio advertising to remain front of mind. His running monologue delights many listeners and annoys a few, but leaves none indifferent.

If he had a nickel for every time he's uttered the phrase "Korry's! In the heart of GreekTown, at Five...Six...Nine.... Danforth Avenue," how would he spend it?

"I've already spent it," he barks. "In the restaurants!"

Ah yes, the restaurants. Of the many GreekTown attractions he extolls on the airwaves, the restaurants and cafés are the common denominator. When Saul isn't sermonizing the suit at Korry's, he can usually be found holding court at one of the area's many dining establishments, relaxing and conversing with clients, relatives, friends, and passers-by.

His on-air "virtual tours" of GreekTown bring a steady stream of new customers to his door, ensuring the continued growth of his brand. But Korman is the first to acknowledge that existing customers "are your first priority. They're your bread and butter."

"It costs five times as much to acquire a new customer as it does to keep an existing one. The only way to have both is to pay attention to everybody."

The service may be old-school, but everything else about Korry's is ultra-modern. The shop has been renovated many times, and its website has just undergone its second major update.

Korman's father Nathan, who founded the business six decades ago, could scarcely have envisioned the Korry's of today.

If Korman could bring him back to Korry's for a day, what would he say?

"He'd ask me why we have so much merchandise, why I'm spending so much money on the store, and why we have so much staff."

After the initial culture shock had worn off, Papa Nathan would surely be proud of the steady stream of customers trying and buying.

He'd understand why six tailors are needed to handle the volume.

He'd grudgingly acknowledge that the store looks like a million bucks.

And he'd kvell over what hasn't changed — the commitment to customer care.

"Fashions change but customer service doesn't", says Saul. "Expertise is required to learn and understand fabrics and fit. But being nice to people doesn't cost you a dime. And it doesn't need to be learned if you're service-oriented."

Saul Korman flanked by sons

Father Nathan can rest in peace knowing that the customer care on which Korry's was founded 60 years ago remains its cornerstone today.

"Our staff is our lifeblood," says Shawn. "If you backdated our history by combined years of service, we'd have opened in the 1800s. Franco Gagliardi's been with us 38 years. Frank Smith 22 years. Jerry Baker 10 years. And he may have to stick around another 10 before anyone laughs at his jokes."

At Korry's, the veterans still lead by example. Younger salespeople who join its team are duly impressed by their energy and focus.

For the clothing "lifers", it's not just about making a sale. It's in their blood. They may hint at retirement, but they don't retire because they can't. "You'll have to call in the National Guard to get us out of here," laughs Saul.

Nor are the staff contributions limited to the salespeople. "We rely on our tailors and our office staff to keep us running like a well-oiled machine," says # ps!) secret of 60-year success: customer service

Shawn (L) and Michael (R)

Shawn. "They are the unsung heroes of this business. They don't get the glory of the big sale or the pat on the back for picking out the right shirt or tie. But we can't live without them."

Apparently, today's man can't live without the skinny suit. What many pundits thought would be a fad has turned into a trend. "It's not going away until the physical fitness craze does," says Shawn. "But the tapered look doesn't suit everyone. When it doesn't work for you, we'll tell you straight up. If it doesn't look good on you, it doesn't look good on us."

Trying to sneak an ill-fitting garment past Saul Korman is like trying to sneak the sunshine past a rooster. "Can't have any bad ads walking around the Danforth."

The men's suit and jacket palette has shown little variation over the past 12 months. Perennial power colours black and navy remain strong, while dark brown continues its resurgence. In shirts and ties, the purple family's upswing in popularity continues unabated. From lilac to mauve to fuschia to indigo, more men are sporting purple hues now than ever before. "In solids and stripes, they add colour and flair to most blue suits and, in the darker shades, to charcoal and black," says Shawn.

The Hugo Boss, Canali, and Coppley collections anchor Korry's high end, while its own Roberto label dominates the midrange. But taking advantage of the Roberto two for one doesn't mean settling for second best. "Proudly made in Canada from Italian fabrics. That's what you get when you buy Roberto." Its quality, he notes, rivals that of imports costing double the price. "We don't sell a low-grade garment," he says. "It's not in our DNA."

To a young man acquiring his first business attire, dressing up may seem foreign at first, grants Saul. "But the biggest mistake you can make is not having at least one impact suit in your wardrobe."

An impact suit, he notes, is one that elicits "Wow, you look great" compliments. "Tom Cruise may not need that positive reinforcement. But you and I do. We need to know we look good, not hope we look good. It's one more thing to feel good about and one less thing to worry about. In a business transaction or social situation, that can be a difference-maker."

If you think he's just trying to sell suits, he has a medical alert for you. "Tell me something. "You're going into the hospital for life-saving surgery. Your surgeon is wearing jeans. Are you okay with that?"

Shawn concurs. "You don't always have to wear a suit, but when you do you're prepared for any situation. And turn it around. When you're the customer and the person you're seeing is wearing jeans, maybe that says you're not as important to him as you'd like to be. Not exactly a message you'd want to receive, or give."

And no one is better at sending messages than Korry's. With Saul bumping his gums on several stations, son Michael forging his own distinct style on others and Shawn becoming more microphone-friendly with each passing day, the Kormans have achieved greater "air space" than Nik Walenda.

Nor could the wire-walking wunderkind have traversed a 60-year span any more adroitly than Saul Korman — or enjoyed a more triumphant diamond jubilee. On May 3, with hundreds present — family, friends, suppliers, visiting dignitaries, and the media — Korman received numerous accolades and a few barbs. In turn, he acknowledged the support of his family, staff, suppliers, fellow merchants, and friends. (Photos of the event can be viewed at hadaball.com). Rarely has a businessperson touched the lives of so many people.

An important component of that connectivity is Korman's unique relationship with, and affinity for, the Greek community in which his business grew. "I've always felt at home here. These people are not just my neighbours, they're my friends. I am truly blessed." He shares the love by relentlessly talking up the street on his airtime dime.

"What's not to love?" he crows. "A hundred good restaurants and cafés. Great neighbours. The Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth, doing so much good for charity. I'm just a kid from Rouyn-Noranda who landed on the Danforth — what did I know? It's almost like G_d handpicked the perfect street for me."

Korry's contributions to the sartorial splendour of Toronto's men are mirrored by its contributions to the community. Its annual golf tournament — hosted again this year by the Scarboro Golf and Country Club — raises significant funds for the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. On June 11, Korman was presented with an award for outstanding community services by the TEGH Foundation, on whose Board he served for many years before stepping down this year. And Korman's promotional efforts on behalf of the annual Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth — which to date has raised well over $1,000,000 for the Toronto East General Hospital — are tireless.

So after 60 years, having reached the top of the mountain, are there any worlds left for Korry's to conquer?

"Are you kidding me?" blazes Saul. "Have you seen the way mountaineers dress? I'm not coming off that mountain until every one of them is wearing a suit."

Planting your flag at the summit in Canali, Boss, Coppley or Roberto?

That's a Kodak moment worthy of any 60th birthday bash.

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kalimera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

Plenty to woo your senses

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright colours and exotic décor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their décor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. It has good old-fashioned diners. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality. The chains are here, but independent family ownership still predominates.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staff members of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants — and a Big Idea — that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for more than half a century — Korry's celebrated its 60th anniversary in May — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

A solid community with solid values

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

Role of a Business Improvement Area (BIA)

As stated on the City of Toronto's website, "A Business Improvement Area (BIA) is an association of commercial property owners and tenants within a defined area who work in partnership with the City to create thriving, competitive, and safe business areas that attract shoppers, diners, tourists, and new businesses. By working collectively as a BIA, local business have the organizational and funding capacity to be catalysts for civic improvement, enhancing the quality of life in their local neighborhood and the City as a whole."

GreekTown Toronto BIA Board Chair Constantine Voidonicolas takes great pride in the fulfillment of this mandate. "It's a team effort. Board members give generously of their time, working in concert with the merchants to make GreekTown as good as it can be. The Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth is the most obvious manifestation of this effort, but the focus on making our area an attractive, safe, and family-oriented destination is year-round."

Per the City Of Toronto's website, it now celebrates a total of 72 BIAs, representing over 32,000 businesses — the largest number of BIAs in North America. Together, they generate over $25 million in funding towards street and sidewalk beautification, marketing and promotional campaigns, street festivals, clean street / graffiti-removal campaigns, and crime prevention strategies. BIAs also acts as a unified voice to address issues on behalf of their membership.

Toronto BIAs are also members of an umbrella organization called the Toronto Association of Business Improvement Areas (TABIA). TABIA encourages and facilitates the exchange of information, experiences, and ideas among BIAs; advocates on behalf of BIAs to influence government policy; helps obtain funding for programs and services for BIAs; and offers discount and savings programs for its members.

A BIA is run by a volunteer Board of Management elected from its members. The Board is nominated at an Annual General Meeting and, once approved by City Council, serves a four-year term concurrent with the term of Council. The Board works on behalf of its BIA and meets regularly to develop budgets, set priorities, implement capital improvements, plan festivals, and promote its business area."

Where's GreekTown? At the corner of The Palace and Danforth

The Palace is not only one of kind in GreekTown by virtue of its distinguished Mediterranean cuisine and décor, it's one of the last of the great old family-owned restaurants. With increasing corporate ownership, the post baby boom generation's decreasing adherence to old-school values, the slow erosion of the family unit, and increased career choices, how many Palaces can our future hold?

If a career in the hospitality industry is in your future, you could save a few thousand dollars in tuition fees by simply observing how they treat you here. Forget Hospitality 101, this is postdoctoral work. No spa package complete with meals, mineral baths and therapeutic massage could relax you more than a family dinner at The Palace.

Peter Hadjis, wife Stella, sister Olga and son John don't just operate a family business, they preside over a Danforth institution. They have held court over this Kingdom for almost 30 years.

In this Palace, you'll dine like Kings and Queens, but without the pomp and ceremony. The service is gracious, but you'll be much to busy enjoying yourself to engage in formalities.

The Palace embodies, like no other Danforth establishment, the spirit of GreekTown. Here, time stands still, in the best possible sense.

How will the Danforth look 30 years from now? Will we still see the "all hands on deck" cohesiveness that comes naturally in a family restaurant like The Palace? Without formal training and pep talks — because everyone understands?

We hope so. But the reality of current demographic and social trends suggests otherwise.

In the meantime, enjoy The Palace: easy to find, hard to leave, impossible to forget.

And if you're a customer of The Palace, you've probably made this verbal faux pas a dozen times.

Yes, there are other fine restaurants in GreekTown. And yes, there are access routes that don't lead directly to The Palace. But there's no other restaurant like this one. And may never be again.

Fit, quality and style harmonize at Blue Shoe Box

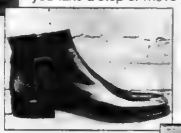
The store, we mean. Fortuitously, the shoes offered here are the aesthetic equal of the shop that sells them. In 2002 proprietor Eliséo (Tony) Staffiere opened The Blue Shoe Box at 499 Danforth just east of Logan. Its reputation for quality and a glove-like fit has garnered a devoted clientele and a Jeannie Beker "Toronto's Top 100" ranking.

Staffiere isn't just a shoe salesman; he's a third-generation Italian shoemaker. He designs and fabricates his own lines for women and men under the FAST and Eliséo Staffiere labels, respectively. Made in Italy to his exacting specifications, these seductively stylish shoes and boots offer exquisite quality and style at hundreds of dollars less than comparable designer shoes. If you enjoy wearing the best without the high price tag, check them out. No one will know they're not Bloor Street trophy shoes unless you tell them.

The superior construction and workmanship of these private label shoes is immediately apparent. With soles double stitched inside out and kid lining, the men's shoe is as rugged outside as it is gentle inside. The same is true of the ladies'. You couldn't wear these out even if you wanted to.



In addition to its private label, The Blue Shoe Box carries a number of leading name brands for men and women. For a small store, the selection is amazing.

Today's men and women, notes Staffiere, want it all: quality, style, and comfort at reasonable prices. "You wear a pair of shoes more than any outfit. Most people put more miles on their shoes than on their car," he smiles. "All the more reason to be good to your feet."

Without quality built in, says Staffiere, a shoe that fits perfectly today may not hold its shape tomorrow. And without the perfect fit, "even a shoe made of spun gold won't help you."

"The margin for error in fitting a shoe is zero," he smiles. "It's not like a shirt or a dress where you can get away with a quarter inch. It also bears your weight, which your clothing doesn't. Every time you take a step or move your feet, your shoes are flexing to accommodate you. They're like a personal limousine."

The Blue Shoe Box occupies a diminutive space, but its design is magical. The elongated, reed-thin premises — a metaphor for a long, slender foot perhaps? — house an intricately moulded 120-year-old copper ceiling, cappuccino spaccoed walls, exposed red brick, butterscotch oak shelving and a gleaming hardwood floor. It's a soothing environment in which to test drive a new limo...er, pair of shoes.

If the shoe fits, wear it. More and more of Toronto's fashion-forward shoppers are finding that fit at the right price in an Italian-made Blue Shoe Box.

New digs, same electricity at bob + paige

For stylists who are always on the cusp of modern trends. Frank Calandrino and Violet Volovik have a soft spot for antiquity. How else to explain their migration to turn-of-the-century premises at 239 Danforth from ultra-modern digs two blocks east?

The truth is, the move was based on practicality, not sentiment. They had outgrown their former location. But it's also true that they'd been eyeing 239 for a while. When it became available, they pounced with catlike quickness.

The same team that made the former bob + paige location a stirring design success was hired for the new location, but restoring its vintage magnificence was more touch-up than transformation. A foundation of great character was already in place.

The frontage is a striking example of turn-of-the century storefront architecture. A central recessed door is flanked on either side by display windows, which angle outward towards the street and are raised off the ground by wooden bulkheads. Above the door and the windows are elegantly patterned glass transoms. Inside, the deep, lofty-ceilinged room laps up the sunlight.

The good news is, Calandrino and Volovik now have more space. The bad news is, they can't hire and train new stylists fast enough to keep pace with the ever-growing demand while still maintaining the same level of quality and service. Having flirted briefly with expansion, they're now more firmly resolved than ever not to go that route until they're 100 percent ready.

"To dilute our quality and service is out of the question," says Frank. We've always said we wouldn't become a factory, and we won't. We will grow only as fast as the fully-focused care of each customer will allow us to — not one second and not one client faster."

Hiring new stylists en masse is incompatible with keeping your current crew at the top of their game, says Violet. "Creativity is only part of being a great stylist," says Violet. "Technique and knowledge are equally important. We nurture our stylists towards that end. This requires time and patience. They take courses and other professional upgrades on a regular basis. They all want to spread their wings and fly solo, and we want them to as well. But only when they're ready. Your stylists cannot achieve their full potential in a numbers game."

A competent stylist is a confident stylists, says Frank — one capable of working with, and doing justice to, anyone's hair — not just their regulars.

In a business where talented employees often leave to start their own shop, Frank and Violet have created a working environment that encourages the good ones to stay on the farm. They generally do — and when a new hire is necessary, there's no shortage of promising candidates to choose from. When you treat your employees well, word gets around.

Over the past year, hairstyling trends have seen a shift towards longer, looser, more textured cuts. (But if you still want a bob or paige cut, bob + paige will happily oblige). Frank and Violet are doing less highlighting and more pastel shading. They also offer Elumen, an innovative high-performance colouring treatment from Goldwell. It lasts 10 times as long as conventional hair colour and is doctor-recommended for anyone allergic or sensitive to the latter. It adheres to the hair via an electric charge.

With the electric atmosphere that's followed bob + paige to their new home, it comes with the territory.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

What's in a 60-year menswear legacy? Family, loyalty — and sleepless nights

The original Korry's store, 1478 Danforth at Coxwell, opened in 1962

Listening to Saul Korman's silky-smooth delivery of a radio commercial is like auditing a course in Self-Affirmation. He's always positive, always upbeat. Poise and self-assurance are where he lives.

It wasn't always so.

It certainly wasn't so in the spring of 1969 — the year Korry's Clothiers decided to move to its current premises at 569 Danforth Avenue.

The story really starts five years previously, in 1964, when Saul decided to leave his father Nathan's business and open his own store.

He'd heard that Tip Top Tailors was closing its street-level locations. Chutzpadick even then, Saul convinced Jimmy Kay and Irving Posluns of Posluns Clothing, who owned Tip Top, to lease him the Tip Top location at 613 Danforth for a reduced rate.

Shortly after he took possession, a representative of the Bank Of Nova Scotia walked into the store and introduced himself. "Where do you bank, young man?"

Korman told him he banked at the Danforth and Coxwell branch of CIBC, but that it was his father's account, not his. The banker suggested he should have his own account, and soon thereafter approved a $10,000 loan. Things were looking up for the young entrepreneur.

"So now I had $10,000 and a storefront, but no inventory. A week later, Mom and Dad walked into the store. 'Why are you leaving me,' says Dad. 'Help me sell my inventory and I'll come work for you'."

Saul agreed. With a view to running a closing sale at his father's store, he hired an accountant to take stock. The accountant informed him that his father had $14,000 in inventory and $65,000 in liabilities.

"So I told Dad, let me make a settlement with the suppliers," says Korman. "No!" shouted Nathan. "We're Kormans. We do not make' settlements'."

So much for that idea. Saul took on the debtload of $65,000, ran the sale — and gave Korry's a new lease on life at 613 Danforth Avenue.

Two years later — needing to renovate and unable to renegotiate a favourable lease with the landlord — Korman decided he'd had enough of being a tenant.

Real estate agent George Carayiannis, now with Homelife Vision, recalls his first meeting with Korman like it was yesterday.

"I'm sitting in my office at 505 Danforth Avenue [where he had his own real estate company at the time] and in walks Saul. He got right to the point."

Korman told Carayiannis that he and father Nathan were tired of renting and wanted to buy a building. Did Carayiannis have anything in the area that would be suitable for a large men's clothing store?

Carayiannis suggested 629 Danforth, then occupied by Siberry's Men's Wear (at the current National Bank location). It was on the market for $115,000.

Korman returned a few days later with an entourage: father Nathan, a lawyer and an accountant. All the elements were in place for a deal.

Except the money.

"Didn't have a dime," says Korman. "All I had was debt: the $65,000 on Dad's merchandise, plus a mortgage on my house." Which he shared with wife Myrna and children Jody, age 9; Michael, 6; and Shawn, 5.

On the lawyer's urging — and against his father's wishes — Korman countered the $115,000 asking price with an offer of $110,000. Nathan pulled him aside. "They're asking $115,000, why not just agree to it? You're not dealing from strength. You don't have the financing yet."

But Saul was having none of it. He loved and respected his father, but this was his time. It wasn't just about the $5,000. It was about winning.

The vendor declined his offer and sold the property two days later to a real estate developer for the asking price of $115,000. That developer flipped it the very next day for $150,000.

A year and a half later, a similar property one block west, then occupied by Byers Dry Goods, sold for $275,000 to an unhappy tenant named...

Saul Korman.

"Listening to the lawyer instead of my father was the biggest mistake I ever made," says Korman. "But it wasn't the lawyer's fault, it was mine. In all my wisdom, I outsmarted myself."

Two weeks later, Korman was chatting over coffee with Al Byers, who knew that his former building had just been sold. He just didn't know to whom. "Some idiot just bought it for $275,0000. Can you believe that?" queried Byers. A thin smile creased Korman's lips. "That idiot? You're looking at him."

So at the age of 36, with two mortgages and a young family to support, how did Mr. Self-Assurance respond?

"I didn't sleep for 10 years," says Korman. (No wonder the coffee shops on the Danforth love him). "The day I paid off my mortgage was the first good night's sleep I had in 10 years."

But before the 10 years of sleepless nights, there was financing to secure. Korman had already applied to the Bank of Nova Scotia for a loan of $50,000. The BNS rep was same gentleman who'd approved his initial $10,000 loan three years previously.

But approval for the $50,000 loan was not yet forthcoming because Korman hadn't divulged what he needed the money for. "I was afraid if they knew I was trying to buy a building, I'd overpay."

Shortly thereafter, he was having lunch with a representative of CIBC. He mentioned that he needed a $50,000 loan. The CIBC banker reviewed his books and said, "We can do it. But did you realize you're paying three percent above prime on your current loan [for day-to-day operating expenses]? We can give you one percent above prime."

Saul Korman today

"Did I know what prime was?" says Korman. "Didn't have a clue. I didn't even know you could negotiate with a bank. I told him he had a deal."

Saul called Nathan to inform him of the CIBC's generous offer. "It costs money to change banks," said Nathan. "Leave it with me." Before Saul could tell him it was a done deal, Nathan hung up.

The next day, the Scotia banker to whom Saul had originally applied showed up with Nathan, ready to talk turkey. "But Dad, I made a deal," says Saul.

"You made a deal?" boomed Nathan. "Why didn't you say so?" Nathan turned to the Scotia banker. "Sorry, you're out."

"But have you signed with them yet?" persisted the Scotia rep. "If you haven't signed anything, there's no problem. And we'll beat whatever they're offering."

Saul and Nathan differed on many things. But on this issue they were of one mind. "You're out," reiterated Nathan. "My son gave the man his word. Our word is our bond. We don't need a piece of paper."

In that moment, says Saul, he knew everything was going to be all right. "Keep in mind I'd just overpaid by $160,000 I didn't even have. That's over a million in today's money. But Dad stuck by me. His loyalty and conviction meant everything to me."

This kind of loyalty — and accountability — are probably the most important factors in business success and longevity, he says. "They certainly were in mine. That, and loving what I do. We couldn't have survived all these years without attracting and keeping the Franco Gagliardis and the Frank Smiths and the Jerry Bakers and all our other great employees."

"I'm not the smartest retailer ever. I may not be the most lovable. I'm definitely not the best-looking," he smiles. "But people always know where they stand with me. I've always tried to take the blame for my own mistakes, and I've made enough to them to learn from."

Whatever his mistakes, underpromoting certainly isn't one of them. He pioneered the art of reality radio long before there was reality TV. His uniquely spontaneous schtick — talking up the neighbouring businesses along with his own — has earned him the undying love and respect of his fellow GreekTown merchants — especially the restauranteurs.

Chris Christodoulou, owner of Pan On The Danforth, knows Korman from the early days. "He helped me early in my career, and he has never stopped helping. He is a great friend to us all. He promotes the street before himself. He is always there when you need him. As far as I'm concerned, he's Mr. Danforth."

Saul Korman in Korry's, 1976

Korman has had the satisfaction of seeing all three of his children follow his footsteps in the clothing business. The loss of daughter Jody in 2006 is something he will never get over, he says, but "it gives me pleasure to see Michael and Shawn making a name for themselves in the business. And it was their choice. Nobody forced them."

From a legacy standpoint, he says, what his children do is less important than how they do it. "I always liked the idea of working with my children, but I never had grandiose visions of them carrying on a clothing' legacy'. I've always said that if you love your trade, it will love you back. If you love the business you're in, then it's the right business for you. The best I can wish for Michael and Shawn is that they come to love this business as much as I do."

Korry's today

The support of family, says Korman, has been critical to his success. "My family has sustained me through thick and thin. Without their love and support, none of this would have been possible."

When he surveys his incredible 60-year career, Korman is astounded by the sheer span of time and by how his many experiences in the business — the people he's met, the things he's learned — have shaped his life. "Sixty years ago, what did I know? And 40 years ago, when we bought the building, I had no idea what the future held. There was no' legacy.' I was just trying to survive."

And don't let the late-found self-assurance fool you, says Korman. For even today — a clothing icon whose 60-year track record fits like a glove — he still experiences anxiety. After thousands and thousands of suit sales, the one he doesn't sell still bothers him.

So if you can't ever feel home and cooled out — if you can't ever bask in the satisfaction of having "made it" — what's the point?

"You never make it," he retorts. "That is the point. The moment you feel you've got nothing left to accomplish, it's over. The moment a customer walks in and you don't care whether he buys or not, it's over."

"What's 'making it'? When you can look in the mirror and say there's no job you'd rather be doing than the one you're doing right now, you've 'made it'."

The fact he's able to say that now, today, makes it all worth it. "I've loved every minute of it," he says.

Even the 10 years of sleepless nights?

"Even the 10 years" he laughs. "I'm almost caught up."

A first-time customer who's heard him on the radio comes by to introduce himself. Korman, who's promised to fix him up with a suit, excuses himself. He's about to have a Robert Frost moment.

For he has promises to keep,
And miles to go before he sleeps.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Navagio (Greek for "Shipwreck") Beach is an isolated sandy cove on Zakynthos island and one of the most famous beaches in Greece. It is notable because it is home to the wreck of the alleged smuggler ship Panagiotis; thus, it is often referred to as 'Smugglers' Cove'. At left you can see the metallic wreckage of the ship, half-buried in the sand.

Navagio is located on the north-west shore of the Ionian island of Zakynthos (Zante), in the Municipality of Elation. The area is defined by its sheer limestone cliffs, white sand beaches, and clear blue water. This strip of beach can be accessed only by boat, but you may also see it from above, standing on the high rocks that overlook it.

The half-buried ship is of recent vintage, however. In 1980 the Greek authorities, who suspected it of smuggling cigarettes and liquor, gave chase in foul weather in the open Ionian sea and ran it ashore in the cove, where it has remained ever since.

This beach one of the most photographed sites in Greece, rivalling the Acropolis of Athens and the Parthenon.

Oasis Foundation helps recovering addicts resume productive lives

Circa 447–432 B.C., the Greeks built the Parthenon. Today, the same tradition of architectural excellence is alive and well in GreekTown, under the watchful eyes of Takis Liris, Adonis Artemakis, and their dedicated crew. The showcase of their efforts is a small, nondescript storefront at 921 Danforth Avenue.

A storefront on Danforth Avenue? A showcase for architectural excellence?

No towering columns? No sculpted statues?

Helping people rebuild their lives and self-esteem to become functioning members of society

If the venue seems odd, it's because this team of "architects" specializes in historical reconstruction — not of buildings, but of people. Under their direction, a team of volunteers helps those laid low by alcohol and drug addiction to rebuild their lives and self-esteem and become functioning members of society.

With financial assistance from Employment Ontario and the City of Toronto — as well as funds generated from the sale of clothing donations to the Oasis green bins located throughout the GTA — the Oasis Movement acts as an umbrella organization for a myriad of programs designed to assist addicts every step of the way through the recovery process. There's an Employment Preparation Program, a Pre-Employment Personal Life Management Program, a Volunteer Program including participants from Toronto Social Services and the general public, a Job Development and Employment Placement Services Program, Casual Labour Placements, and the Oasis Employment Resource Centre.

The mission statement on the home page of the Oasis website (www.oasisfoundation.org) engages the viewer directly:

"Oasis invites you to be part of a movement that helps individuals who have made the decision to be free of drugs and alcohol and integrate themselves back into society by providing programs and services designed to help them to stabilize their recovery, overcome personal barriers, educate themselves and join the workforce by finding viable employment."

The website also contains testimonials from former addicts who, through the programs offered at Oasis, have been able to recover and resume leading productive lives. They serve as an inspiration — not only to other addicts, but to anyone with obstacles to overcome.

These programs are also available to family members and friends and to individuals in need — those who have employment barriers and have difficulty finding a job.

Says Liris, who founded the Oasis Movement in 1992, "To assist someone who is already on an upcurve is nice. But to help someone who's down pick himself up — now there's an accomplishment. We may think we know what it's like to hit rock bottom, but unless we've experienced it ourselves or seen it first-hand, we really don't know what it's like."

"When we can reach out to someone in that position and help him or her regain the ability to function, be gainfully employed, mend broken relationships, restore their faith — that's a success story for everybody."

No greater accomplishment than helping someone who's down get back on their feet

Continues Artemakis, who's been involved with Oasis since 1992 in a supportive and advisory capacity: "There's no stage here, no award presentations, no trophies. Everyone who is here is part of something bigger than themselves. People talk of "relationship building". Here, we are helping people rebuild their relationship with themself. No office tower, theatre or concert hall is a greater monument to a person's accomplishment than helping another human being get back on his feet again."

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Loutro, a small, picturesque fishing village in southwestern Crete, evokes the tranquility of a simpler lifestyle. A visit to Toronto's GreekTown brings its warmth and values close to home.

Why good things happen in GreekTown

It's around this time, leading up to the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth, that some Toronto neighbourhoods not named GreekTown start exhibiting symptoms of mild discomfort. This malaise, first observed in 1994 — the year of the inaugural Taste of the Danforth — could best be termed GreekTown Envy.

If you're in business, it's only natural to admire the success of your competitors and attempt to emulate it. And make no mistake about it — neighbourhoods do compete for your shopping, dining and entertainment dollar. There are BIAs (Business Improvement Areas) all over Toronto racking their brains at this very moment in an attempt to attract you to their neighbourhood and secure your patronage.

From the Taste to My Big Fat Greek Wedding*, GreekTown's good mojo casts a welcoming net*

The resounding annual success of the Taste — Canada's largest street festival — speaks to GreekTown's penchant for making good things happen. It took a few big thinkers to get the ball rolling back in 1994, and it's taken plenty of sponsorship and grassroots support since then to sustain the momentum. Without the collective will of everyone involved, even the biggest of ideas goes nowhere.

Most other neighbourhoods give GreekTown its due. Those that don't — the GreekTown wannabees — will tell you that the Taste Of The Danforth could have happened anywhere.

That's not the point. The point is, it happened in GreekTown. It happened in GreekTown not only because of the energetic forward thinkers who conceived it, but also because of the fertile soil in which they planted their seed. It happened in GreekTown because the welcoming spirit of the restaurants and shops from Broadview to Jones is precisely the kind of environment that allows such an undertaking to flourish.

Street festivals are a source of food, fun, and family entertainment. When you can parlay all that into significant financial support for a community hospital (Toronto East General), you're accomplishing something special.

So, it's no accident that the Taste of the Danforth originated here. Nor is it surprising that the exuberant 2002 hit movie My Big Fat Greek Wedding chose to shoot some scenes here. The festive spirit of a community capable of lavishing affection on its guests — and laughing at itself — attracts positive energy. The area's increasing ethnocultural diversity and cosmopolitan flavour merely enhance its appeal.

It's a big world we live in. Whether you're five or 55, if you dropped everything right now and spent the rest of your days travelling this planet, you'd barely begin to cover it. Even if you confined your travels to a much smaller area — like Greece — you would experience a small part, at best, of its wonders.

You can't know the entire planet, but a visit to GreekTown will get you off to a running start.

In this thouliamou, they don't count the hours

Thouliamou. Parnosse. Livelihood. It's what most of us are lucky to have. And what most of us still complain about in our weaker moments.

The most common complaint is long hours. For many of us, 12- or 15-hour days mean overtime. For the average GreekTown restauranteur, they're standard time.

For most of us, one a.m. and unable to sleep means it's time to take a sedative. For the GreekTown restauranteur, it means it's time to serve another customer.

Long hours? Long days? These people eat long days for breakfast.

In fact, some of their days are so long, they finish up just in time to see their children eat breakfast.

Passing the torch is a metaphor frequently used in GreekTown. Mom and Dad or Dad and Uncle start a business, build it up, and pass the torch to their children. Here, the metaphor's doubly apt because with the hours some restauranteurs keep, that torch could well be a flashlight.

Time was, it was almost automatic for children to take up that torch. Today, less so. Times have changed. Children can now count their options because Mom and Dad didn't count their hours.

Good thing they didn't. How could they? In this business, serving food is just the tip of the iceberg. In order to be able to serve it, you have to first take inventory, buy supplies, bring them to the restaurant, and prepare them. As well as do a few other things like cleaning, washing, maintenance, linens, laundry, cutlery, payroll, hiring, paying bill after bill after bill — a triplication of your bills at home — the list goes on.

Unless you're so successful you can afford hired help for everything, you won't get it all done in eight hours. You might not get it done in ten hours. But in 12 or 15 hours, slowly slowly, you get it all done. Or enough of it to enjoy the few hours of sleep that remain — far more than the eight hours you wouldn't enjoy if you left all those loose ends hanging.

Times change, but values don't. Of the restaurants featured in this section, the vast majority are family businesses. Some have been passed on from parents to children, but in many of them, the parents are still active.

The inability to count can be habit-forming; many of these people don't count the years, let alone hours. Why should they? Why pass the torch when you're having so much fun carrying it yourself?

The children who do take up that torch — because the restaurant business is locked into their DNA — inherit not only a lifestyle but a lesson.

They learn that in this thouliamou, time is a relative concept. It's easier to work the hours than to count them. And it's relatively easier to work them with a relative or two working alongside you.

They learn that the 12- or 15-hour days that Mom and Dad worked — those long hours that might have deprived them of their favourite audience for a hockey game or soccer game or dance class — weren't really too many hours all. Turns out they were just the right number of hours needed to put bread on the table.

They learn that even though it's impossible not to feel enslaved by the business occasionally, it's more often liberating to discover just how much you can accomplish when you push your limits. And how much more time you had than you thought you had when less time is spent sleeping.

Most importantly, they learn that — in this thouliamou at least — long hours aren't the problem.

They're the solution.

U.S. increases pressure on Iran

Obama announces tougher sanctions

JTA

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama announced tougher sanctions on Iran's energy sector and banks July 31, on the eve of U.S. Secretary of Defence Leon Panetta's arrival in Israel.

Panetta was in Israel for a short working visit with Israeli officials to discuss U.S.-Israel defence ties and the potential threat of a nuclear-armed Iran.

Panetta met with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres.

Before his meeting with Barak, Panetta told reporters, "We are a friend, we are a partner, we have – as the defence minister has pointed out – probably the strongest U.S.-Israel defence relationship that we have had in history.

"What we are doing, working together, is an indication not only of our friendship but of our alliance to work together to try to preserve peace in the future."

After Panetta's meeting with Netanyahu, the Prime Minister's Office released a text of the two men's statements.

In his remarks, Netanyahu said that more forceful steps are urgently needed to deter the Iranian nuclear project. "Unfortunately... neither sanctions nor diplomacy have yet had any impact on Iran's nuclear weapons program. America and Israel have also made clear that all options are on the table. You yourself said a few months ago that when all else fails, America will act.

"But these declarations have also not yet convinced the Iranians to stop their program.

Family Deported

TORONTO — Members of a Russian family who said they'd be persecuted if deported to Israel because they have a Jewish-sounding surname but aren't Jewish were arrested and put on a flight to Tel Aviv July 27 after seeking refuge in a Scarborough church for a year. Ilan and Irit Brovman and their two children, 8 and 5, had been living in the basement of West Hill United Church, the Toronto Sun reported. The failed refugee claimants had been sought on warrants after they didn't show up for removal in July 2011. The family arrived in Canada in 2007 and claimed refugee status. The parents came to Israel from Russia in 1992. They said they were insulted and assaulted in Israel because of their name.

Cemetery Damaged

VANCOUVER — Police were looking for leads last week after a group of youths apparently vandalized dozens of headstones and memorials in the mainly Jewish and Asian section of Vancouver's oldest cemetery. Police were called shortly before 7 a.m. on July 28 when someone out for a walk through the southeast part of Mountain View Cemetery noticed damage to some headstones. Nearby residents reported that a group of youths were heard partying in the area between 1:30 and 2 a.m., but police weren't called. There were no graffiti, and police found empty beer bottles and cans in the area with the damage.

WORLD

Siyum Celebration

NEW YORK — Some 90,000 people packed MetLife Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J., to celebrate the completion of the page-a-day Talmud cycle in the largest-ever Siyum Hashas. The Aug. 1 gathering, which was simulcast to some 60 U.S. cities and more than 20 countries, marked the end of the 7-1/2-year cycle it takes to complete the Talmud at the rate of two sides of a page per day. The program, known as Daf Yomi, was begun by Rabbi Meir Shapiro in 1923, and the first siyum, or completion, was celebrated in Lublin, Poland, in 1930. This year's siyum marked the end of the 12th cycle since then. The stadium event consisted mostly of speeches in English and Yiddish and short video tributes. Rabbi Malkiel Kotler of the Beth Medrash Govoha in Lakewood, N.J., taught the final section of the Talmud to the crowd. Once the ceremony was complete, the crowd erupted in thunderous singing and dancing.

Munich Victim's Sister Criticizes Romney

David Berger

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The sister of one of the Israeli athletes murdered at the Munich Olympics said U.S. Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's failure to press for a moment of silence in Salt Lake City in 2002 on the 30th anniversary of the killings was painful.

Barbara Berger, whose brother, David, a U.S. native, was an Israeli weightlifter in 1972, wrote in Ha'aretz Aug. 1 that families of the 11 victims of a Palestinian terrorist attack at the Munich Olympics would continue to advocate for a formal moment of silence at the Olympic opening ceremony, despite the refusal of the International Olympic Committee to allow such a moment this year, the massacre's 40th anniversary.

Berger said the families were heartened by growing international support for such a moment, in particular praising U.S. President Barack Obama.

Berger noted that Romney subsequently added his support, and the families were grateful. But she faulted him for his silence when he attended the opening ceremonies in London on July 27 and when he headed the 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics.

She said Romney was also "painfully silent" during his trip to Israel after attending the London Games. Romney's campaign will not comment on his 2002 silence.

Groups want Queen's Park rally cancelled

2011 anti-Israel event marked by 'vicious antisemitism'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

With its Hezbollah flags, near hysterical tone and slogans that accused Zionists of being racists, inhuman and barbarians, last year's "Al-Quds" rally at Queen's Park shocked many observers.

This year, two major Jewish organizations are calling on the province to refuse permission for a similar "antisemitic hate rally."

In a letter to Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) urged the government to "not sanction organizations calling for war, death and hate towards Jews by permitting the use of public property for such a purpose."

Meanwhile, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has called on Queen's Park's sergeant-at-arms to decline to give permission for the demonstration.

CIJA, which taped last year's rally and posted it on the Internet, said video of the event demonstrates "the kind of vicious antisemitism being preached" on Queen's Park grounds and which violate the legislature's own terms of use.

CIJA spokesperson Steve McDonald said last year's rally was organized by a radical Shiite group originally founded by Iran's late leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. Participants openly flew flags of Hezbollah – a terrorist group – while speakers repeated antisemitic canards, including those that compared Zionists to a growing cancer.

"We have every reason to believe the same thing will recur," McDonald said.

This year's proposed Queen's Park rally is scheduled for Aug. 18 and is part of a larger campaign to protest "the usurpation of the Holy Land by the Zionist regime."

According to freealquds.org, rallies will be held in Vancouver, Calgary, Montreal and Ottawa, as well as in a number of American cities.

Last year's Toronto rally was sponsored by the Canadian Shia Muslims Organization (CASMO), which in the past has posted videos by former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke on its website.

The Al-Quds Rally was originally created by Khomeini. According to one of his contacts in the Iranian expatriate community, "this is a direct extension of the regime abroad and not just a threat to the Jewish community, but the Iranian expatriate community," McDonald said.

Ontario taxpayers have the right to know their legislature will not be used as a platform for antisemitism, he added.

In his letter to McGuinty, FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo said, "Ontarians were shocked and embarrassed that a blatantly antisemitic event was held [last year] at the seat of the provincial government."

A rare moment

The impishly smiling man in the middle of the photo, inset, is of course, Natan Sharansky, the 64-year-old chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel. Most of the Jewish and wider world born at least into the 1960s, know him very well. In the late '70s and through the next decade, he became the avatar of the struggle for freedom by the Jews of the Soviet Union. In those days he was known as Anatoly.

After he stepped onto the soil of Israel, finally after a cruel incarceration of some nine years, he became Natan. His life is well chronicled, including by his own hand in an autobiography called Fear No Evil and by the incomparable historian Sir Martin Gilbert in a book called Sharansky: Hero of Our Time.

From the editor's desk...

The very mention of the name Anatoly (Natan) Sharansky was synonymous with bravery, resolve, resilience and true audacity of spirit. His parting speech to his judges and imprisoners at the kangaroo Soviet Court before heading back to jail in 1978 on the contrived, phoney charges of espionage is a modern classic of soaring inspiration, to the point, unrepentant, elegantly defiant to the very last against the sadistic, brutal system of totalitarian KGB government.

A poet, songwriter, musician and composer, Sussman was born and raised in Edmonton many years before the NHL and Wayne Gretzky came to play there. His parents, Max and Helene, of blessed memory, were exemplars of hospitality, kindness and goodness. Despite the relatively small number of Jews in their community and the rather large distances between Edmonton and other Jewish communities in Western Canada and in the western United States, they ensured that Joel was raised knowing who he was. They ensured he would have sufficient knowledge about his people's history and traditions to be able, years later, to make reasoned decisions about the extent of the Jewish life he might lead and the destiny he would fashion for himself.

The group was "the" voice and amplifier to the world for the awakening and uniquely stirring sounds of specifically Jewish social activism that flowed across campuses like surging rivers lifting unseen treasure that shone in the sun on the cluttered, muddy riverbanks of anti-Israel polemics. Through their music, Safam invited young Jews to a new place of identity and belonging that many had not visited before. How many lives they changed with a lyric that opened a closed heart or a melody that evoked memories and perhaps, a tear.

One of the songs for which Safam became widely known and sought out by Jewish community organizers around the continent was Leaving Mother Russia.

Written by Solomon in 1977, it sings the unimaginable burden of Sharansky's imprisonment and of the hope he carried his freedom. It begins as a lament, a solitary, piercingly beautiful narrative voice, and finishes as a rallying cry, a chorus of voices, marching forward in broad, resolute harmonies, emboldened by the strength that comes from others who joined the cause.

Just as Sharansky became the human face of the Jews imprisoned or oppressed in the Soviet gulag for wanting to emigrate, Leaving Mother Russia became the anthem of the worldwide struggle on behalf of Soviet Jewry.

Though they sing less frequently today than in decades past and though more "mature" in their appearance than some 40 years ago, the group still makes profoundly precious music.

This photo of Safam and Sharansky actually captures a rare moment of modern Jewish history. It depicts the only time the band performed Leaving Mother Russia in the presence of the man who inspired it and for whom it was written in 1977. It was an emotionally electric embrace among singers and Sharansky at a recent concert at Temple Mishkan Tefila in Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Sussman described the feelings in an email: "The high drama built to a crescendo towards the end of the final choruses on the song when, all of a sudden, Mr. Sharansky appeared at the rear of the synagogue and began the long walk down the aisle with 1,100 people standing and clapping in rhythm to the chant of 'we are leaving Mother Russia, we have waited far too long.'

"As he approached the bimah where the band was playing the song, we all got the chills at the realization of what was happening... What a triumphant moment!

Viewing the video of the performance was a trip back in time. The contrast between our wholehearted embrace of Israel and of Jewish causes in "those" formative Safam days and the increasing disengagement by so many of our youth from Israel and from Jewish causes today warrants serious study and reflection. Perhaps for another column.

The video can be seen on the Safam website.

Young emissaries bring Israel to life for campers

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

URJ Camp George is one of 14 Canadian summer camps – from Camp Hatikvah in British Columbia to Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia – to use young emissaries as a way of educating campers about Israel.

This summer, Camp George has eight Israeli staff members who have completed their IDF service and are part of the Jewish Agency for Israel's summer shlichim program. They are among 1,054 emissaries sent to North American camps as part of the 45-year-old program. Of the group, more than 50 young Israelis are at Canadian camps.

As well, Camp George has two Israeli staff members who have spent the past year in Toronto working at Leo Baeck Day School and two Reform congregations as part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's shinshinim program. The program, which has a dozen shinshinim working at summer camps, derives its name from the first letters of the Hebrew words "Shnat Sherut," denoting a year of service after high school.

Rabbi Noam Katz, Camp George's supervisor of educational programming, said that ever since the camp started in 1999, there has been an Israeli delegation.

Israel education is part of the culture of the Reform movement camps, he said, adding that there's no better opportunity than having young Israelis "bring Israel to life."

The shlichim serve as counsellors and specialists, and lead formal programs about Israel including a "Yom Yisrael" (Israel Day), which they run with North American staff.

As well, Rabbi Katz added, informal conversations between campers and staff are part of the experience. "At its best, we create a space where they can have deep and nurturing relationships and friendships that extend beyond the summer."

Stav Karmel, a 22-year-old shlichah from a Reform community in the Galilee, stressed the importance of the personal connections made at camp.

Karmel, whose father made aliyah from Vancouver at age 15, said that Israel doesn't offer the same type of summer camp experience.

Niki Tarablus, 20, a native of Kfar Saba who is working at Camp George this summer, said she hopes campers will learn more about Israel and want to visit there as well.

Israeli orphans visit Toronto during unique trip

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Forty-five Israeli children who have lost a parent in the service of the State of Israel recently returned home from a fully subsidized three-week vacation that began in Illinois and ended in Toronto.

The trip is offered annually by an organization called Israel Defence Forces Widows and Orphans (IDFWO), a non-profit association that provides social, emotional and financial support to 8,000 widows and orphans of Israel's fallen soldiers.

Some of the programs offered by the organization include education scholarships for orphans, a special event honouring IDF orphans enlisting in the army, medical assistance and financial aid.

The trip, which provides the children with a break from reality and an opportunity to meet with other kids who have experienced the loss of a parent, began on July 12 with a two-week stay at Camp Chi in the Chicago area. The group then travelled to New York City, and spent a weekend in Connecticut before arriving in Toronto on July 30, where they stayed until last Thursday.

In Toronto, volunteers, most of them members of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, hosted the participants in their homes, and a committee, headed by Esti Cohen and Amy Bitton, organized activities including a bowling night at Bathurst Bowlarama, a day at Canada's Wonderland, a tour of Niagara Falls and an afternoon at Debbie and Warren Kimel's family cottage.

This was the second time the trip included Toronto in its itinerary.

During their stay in Toronto, two participants, both young girls who had lost their fathers when they were toddlers, spoke to The CJN about what the IDFWO trip has meant to them.

Shira Begin, 13, the great-granddaughter of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, said she first became involved with the organization last year, when she took part in the bar and bat mitzvah program – which includes a visit with Israeli President Shimon Peres, a ceremony at the Kotel (Western Wall) in Jerusalem and a reception attended by the minister of defence and the chief of staff.

Shira lost her father, Maj. Yonatan Begin, when the F-16 fighter plane he was flying crashed into the Mediterranean during a training flight in 2000.

She said meeting other children who have lost a parent has been very meaningful for her.

Shira Begin, left, and Emily Nesterenko, two of the 45 participants on the Israel Defence Forces Widows and Orphans' annual North American trip, enjoy a night out at Toronto's Bathurst Bowlarama.

"It's nice to know that someone 'gets you' and helps you because you know that they went through what you went through," Shira said, switching back and forth between English and Hebrew.

Emily Nesterenko, 12, was two years old, when her father, Alexander Nesterenko, an IDF reservist with the border police, was killed in a Palestinian ambush while on patrol near Kibbutz Nir Oz.

Speaking in Hebrew, Emily said this experience has allowed her to "meet new people, kids that you can trust, and it's much easier to speak with them about what happened to you than it is to speak to other kids."

"Other kids can tell you that they understand, but they can't really," Shira added.

But Emily insisted that it's not hard for her to talk about her father's death "because I approach it in a way that my father was a hero in the army and I like to tell the story to let people know what a hero he was."

IDFWO resource development director Daniel Tuksar, who travelled with the group, said he was "absolutely overwhelmed" by the experience.

"First of all, I'm so proud of them because these are 12- and 13-year-old kids, away from home, and they are acting so nice, so polite, so mature and bringing so much kavod for us Israelis."

He added that he gets goosebumps thinking about how welcoming and loving all the volunteers and hosts have been.

"The amount of love [the kids] are receiving and how they're being embraced by every person who has been in touch with them – the hairs are standing up on my arms," Tuksar said.

He said when it comes to families volunteering as hosts for the kids, "people are fighting for a chance to get involved."

In addition to providing an unforgettable experience for the children, he said, a program such as this helps to build bridges between Israel and the Diaspora.

Although some of the funding for the organization comes from the Israeli government, IDFWO relies mostly on donations from Jewish communities in North America. In June, Toronto residents Stella and Peter Ekstein hosted a fundraiser in their home to help IDFWO pay for its programming.

For more information, contact Tuksar at Daniel@idfwo.org.

The Iran question

No sooner had the airplane carrying U.S. Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney lifted off last week from Ben-Gurion Airport than the airplane carrying U.S. Secretary of Defence Leon Panetta touched down.

Romney's visit was cosmetic, a photo and fundraising opportunity in his campaign for the White House. Panetta's visit, on the other hand, was a working trip, with messages in hand from the White House.

Panetta met with President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Minister of Defence Ehud Barak. When the video cameras were not rolling and the photographers had left, the pressing subject on the table was Iran.

The calendar is closing in on the West's efforts to stop the Iranians from actually building a nuclear weapon and on Israel's narrower, shorter-term focus of stopping the Iranians from acquiring the capability to build a nuclear weapon. Iranian scientists and their political and military overseers are working without relent to get to their nuclear platform even as the U.S. presidential elections, now less than three months away, inexorably approach.

Weighty, horrible decisions must soon be made.

American legislators commendably agreed last month to impose further sanctions upon Tehran. Yet there is an increasingly uneasy sense among western governments that sanctions and diplomacy are failing to convince the Iranian leaders to stop their nuclear weapons program. Even former Mossad head Efraim Halevy, a proponent of restraint against Iran, has publicly acknowledged that sanctions have thus far been futile and that Israel's critical moment of decision is quickly approaching.

The American administration is well aware of the shortening horizon on the Iran file. Panetta spoke forcefully and unambiguously on the subject during his visit in Jerusalem. "I want to reassert again the position of the United States that with regards to Iran, we will not allow Iran to develop a nuclear weapon, period. We will not allow them to develop a nuclear weapon, and we will exert all options in the effort to ensure that that does not happen."

But as some Israeli commentators pointed out, the West must act before an Iranian nuclear weapon appears. The Jewish state, however, must act to prevent current Iranian leaders from having the capability of building the weapon. And if there is still any doubt why this is so, one need only refer to the remarks last week by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to a group of visiting ambassadors from Islamic countries.

"Any freedom lover and justice seeker in the world must do its best for the annihilation of the Zionist regime [our emphasis] in order to pave the path for the establishment of justice and freedom in the world."

Now more than ever, countries that revere peace and world stability must act immediately to prevent Iran from attaining nuclear weapons capability. There is little time left.

Roundup of Jews was 100% French

In the article "Dr. Seuss and the Holocaust in France" (July 26), there is what I prefer to consider as a factual error. It states that "over the next two days, more than 13,000 Jews were rounded up in Paris by the Germans, with the active collaboration of the Vichy government headed by Nazi supporter Pierre Laval." It is not true that the roundup was done by the Germans. Everything about it was 100 per cent French. The only part taken by the Germans was to ask for it. Vichy's secretary of police, René Bousquet, ordered it, organized it and the French police of Paris carried it out. I am of French Jewish background and was not taken because my parents were wise enough to send me to the country several months before the roundup. As for them, they escaped arrest by a miracle, as the janitor of the building they lived in warned them.

Remembers Italian cyclist

I am writing about the article "Cycling legend saved Italian Jews," (July 12), regarding Italian cyclist Gino Bartali, whose story has been, until recently, unheralded. As a 12-year-old in Paris, I remember his name for his 1938 Tour de France victory. This story put a new face on this bicycle rider, and it allows me and your readers to grasp again the enormity of what happened in World War II.

Genocides should be treated equally

The article "Feds, province rescue human rights museum" (Aug. 2) is factually incorrect and misleading in claiming that the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association or the undersigned have ever asked for the Holodomor to "be given equal space with the Holocaust in the museum." Our position was, and remains, that all of the galleries in this taxpayer-funded national institution should be thematic, comparative and inclusive; obviously the Shoah must be included in the Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR), most fittingly in a gallery dedicated to exploring the many incidents of genocide that have befouled human history, before, during and since the World War II. What we have objected to is the elevation of any community's suffering (including our own) above all others in a publicly funded national museum. In taking this position we find ourselves in agreement with the majority of Canadians who oppose preferential treatment for any group at the CMHR.

Questions reasons for choosing Jewish education

I admire Rabbi Jay Kelman's financial acumen in devising a scheme to reduce the cost of private Hebrew day school tuition ("How my tuition plan would work," July 12). Having seen some large families enrolled in these schools, however, I am not convinced that the costs constitute an effective method of birth control. But perhaps the same principle could be applied to financing the future costs of bar/bat mitzvahs, lavish weddings, summer camp, humanitarian trips to Africa, first cars, university and down payments on childrens' homes and long-term care facilities. However, I do take offence with his implication, or my inference, that making Hebrew day schools more financially accessible might also reduce the "evils" (my word) of intermarriage. I am the father-in-law of two lovely children, neither of whom was born Jewish, one of whom teaches and enriches the lives of children at one of our Hebrew schools and the other who would not accept a Chicago salami even under duress. Surely this should not be one of the motivations for choosing a private Jewish education, in spite of what I agree are the unfair and exorbitant costs.

Clarifying clarification

I would like to clarify Rabbi Howard Morrison's clarification ("Refugees' health care, letters, Aug. 29). Although there might be some Orthodox communal rabbis who are members of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, nevertheless the TBR does not in any way represent the Orthodox rabbinate in Toronto. For many years, the Orthodox Torah view has been represented by the Toronto Vaad Harabonim, and any suggestion otherwise is a misrepresentation.

Church should not take adopt anti-Israel policy

The following is an open letter to Rev. David Allen, executive secretary of the Toronto Conference of the United Church of Canada, from Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, in advance of the church's 41st General Council, Aug. 11-18 in Ottawa.

I am writing you as a neighbour and colleague to express my concern about the Report of the Working Group on Israel/Palestine Policy, which will be considered by the 41st General Council of the United Church of Canada this month. I write out of great respect for the United Church and many years of cordial relationships with various ministers and churches.

I write as someone who has lived in Jerusalem during the days of the intifadah when I witnessed horrific bombings initiated by Hamas and Hezbollah. I also have seen the remnants of missiles showered upon kindergartens in communities near Gaza. I have been fired upon by guns shot from Palestinian communities in neighbouring Bethlehem.

I write as an advocate of citizen-diplomacy. I have spent time in Christian homes and institutions in Bethlehem. Last year, I was the first Canadian rabbi to meet with Palestinian political and entrepreneurial leadership in Ramallah at the invitation of the prime minister, Mr. Salam Fayyad. I have listened carefully to Palestinians describe the challenges of living with checkpoints and discrimination.

I write as a believer in the possibility of public reconciliation of the Abrahamic religions. Last year, Imam Abdul Hai Patel, Rev. Karen Hamilton, Rev. Damien MacPherson and I led the first Canadian-based Muslim-Christian-Jewish study mission – "In the Path of Abraham" – to Israel and Palestine, to explore the complexities of religious, historical and political issues in the Holy Land. There were approximately 60 people, evenly divided between the three religious traditions, among our group, which also included Rev. John Joseph Mastrandea.

I write after having carefully read the report that will be presented to the General Council and call upon you to encourage friends, colleagues and delegates to reject proposals that I consider to be negative for the following reasons:

• During our Path of Abraham mission, we saw that the challenges of three religions, two peoples and one land make it exceedingly difficult for outsiders to dictate terms to the active and engaged participants. We clearly saw elements of Israeli control that were troubling. We also witnessed instances of Israeli-Palestinian co-operation. On another occasion, I also have eaten dairy products produced by settler communities in Christian homes in Bethlehem.

• In my meetings with Mr. Fayyad's representatives and Palestinian business leaders, they stressed frustration with Jewish settlements as well as an awareness that any resolution would ultimately depend on mutual negotiations between the two parties. Palestinian businesspeople asked us to encourage investment in the Palestinian economy (construction, auto sales, service areas). They did not suggest boycotts, they spoke of the ways they already quietly co-operate for the economic stability and improvement of all the parties.

• As I read the report, I was deeply troubled by what I took to be a Christian call for a boycott of Jewish products. There was no suggestion that restrictions be placed on all products from the Palestinian territories, just those produced by Jews.

• I feel that the report is influenced by internal Christian conflicts about messianic redemption and current political realities, as well as by different Jewish and Christian perceptions of the best pathway to a peaceful and just resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It ignores the role that Hamas and Hezbollah have played in contributing to the problems of Israelis and Palestinians. It fails to recognize that the intifadah (in the words of a Palestinian official to me) "led to a tragedy that we brought upon ourselves."

• The proposed boycott would be understood by many as a call by the church to refrain from the purchase of all Israeli products. This will contribute to a deterioration of trust by Jews in Christian efforts to combat antisemitism, negatively affect relations between the United Church and Jewish communities in Canada, and damage the reputation of the church as a respected voice for peace, moderation, and fairness in Canadian civil society.

In place of those elements that attempt to impose negative measures upon the Jewish state through economic coercion, which – notwithstanding the language – amounts to nothing less than a boycott, I suggest that the General Council should:

• Focus on those elements of the report that encourage investments for peace and to support the growth of the Palestinian economy.

• Recognize that Palestinian terrorism and anti-Jewish incitement play a role in the current impasse. The report identifies the occupation as the primary source of the conflict; not a single expectation or obligation is asked of the Palestinian leadership. Israel has made serious compromises on the ground in pursuit of peace and I have been part of many demonstrations by Israeli Jews in support of compromise and peace. But my Israeli friends also want to see significant efforts made by Palestinians in the direction of peace.

• Call upon Israelis and Palestinians to work together to create an atmosphere conducive to reconciliation and peace. The United Church could work with the Canadian Jewish community to identify projects that we could mutually support through the government of Canada.

I was deeply troubled by what I took to be a Christian call for a boycott of Jewish products

The United Church should not take an anti-Israel policy stance in order to be pro-Palestinian. The church should strive to be pro-Palestinian, pro-Israel and pro-peace.

From Jerusalem, where I am visiting my 11-month-old granddaughter, my most sincere and personal investment for peace, I remain,

Sincerely,
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

United Church comments on boycott stance

"During my term as moderator, I've found it difficult to get the attention of the so-called mainstream media on any of the urgent spiritual and moral matters of our day – other than Israel/Palestine, on which the media come to us."
– Mardi Tindal, moderator of the United Church of Canada, July 30, 2012.

"What we're calling for is a focused boycott of products that are being created illegally. To buy settlement products is the same as buying stolen goods – in other words, benefiting from the crime. [However], this is not a call for a boycott of Israel or Israeli products."
- The Very Rev. David Giuliano, chair of the United Church's working group on Israel/Palestine policy and a former United Church moderator, May 1, 2012.

"Our decision to continue to recognize Israel as a Jewish state is highly controversial among [our] Christian Palestinian partners. Their concern is that if Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state, it will then provide support to those who wish to have Palestine become an Islamic state. Palestinian Christians strongly desire Palestine to be a secular democratic state, something they believe is only likely if Israel remains that as well."
– Bruce Gregersen, member of the United Church's working group on Israel/Palestine Policy, in a June 3, 2012, letter to Canadian Senator Nancy Ruth.

"It is unacceptable to insist that Palestinians accept Israel as a Jewish state as a precondition of continuing negotiations."
– From the United Church's report on Israel/Palestine, released May 1, 2012.

How air conditioning cooled off my prejudices

We Israelis too often judge our fellow countrymen superficially – by the way they dress, their accents, their kippot, their complexions. I, too, suffer from this malady and recently had a refreshing opportunity to revisit some of my own preconceived notions.

It's been boiling this summer in Israel. In Jerusalem, we endured 10 days in mid-July when the mercury reached the upper 30s Celsius, peaking at 41 for two blistering days.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Being the Jerusalemite that I am, over the years, I've been adamant about not needing air conditioning. While it gets hot, sometimes very hot, we live in the arid Judean Hills, well away from the atrocious humidity of the coastal plain. And come sundown, temperatures drop, and we enjoy cool evening breezes. In short, the heat has been bearable.

So I don't quite know what got into me. Maybe it's global warming and the undeniable fact that Jerusalem is no longer immune to humidity, or perhaps I'm getting a bit older (just a bit, mind you) and want more creature comforts, or possibly it has something to do with living on the top floor of an apartment building and suffering from the sun's inexorable seasonal onslaught upon our roof. Whatever the reason, late this spring, just as prices jumped exponentially because of the weather, my wife and I finally surrendered to the elements and ordered air conditioning for our home, albeit energy sufficient and sufficiently green.

Miraculously, just a few days before that horrible heat wave, three skillful technicians descended upon our home. And while in the six hours they spent with us, they left a much-larger-than-expected mark on some of the walls and ceilings, with concrete and dust flying in all directions, at the end of the day, we could feel the fruits of their labour – a wondrous stream of arid 25-degree air flowing into our rooms.

But spending that half-day with adroit professionals gave me something else that I didn't pay for.

Uncharacteristically, the technicians were early. The first one I met was Noam, a black-kippah-clad man lying on the grass at the entrance to our building with crates all around him, listening to a Talmud class on his iPhone. He was soon joined by Yossi and Yussuf.

They started working – shlepping, drilling, climbing, measuring, connecting and more. Labouring in the heat, it was clear this wasn't their first time working together.

Turns out it was the 17th day of the Hebrew month of Tammuz, a fast day commemorating the breach of the walls of Jerusalem before the destruction of the Second Temple and Noam, a 28-year-old modern haredi father of two from one of Jerusalem's northern neighbourhoods, was getting a lighter load this day because he was fasting. When conversation turned to one of the country's most topical issues – mandatory conscription for haredi men – he was quick to mention he'd served for three years in the elite Nahal Brigade.

If Yossi, the foreman, hadn't occasionally called out to Yussuf, I doubt I'd have noticed the latter was an Arab. He spoke Hebrew and looked like your average sabra. A 20ish Muslim resident of Atur, an east Jerusalem neighbourhood on the Mount of Olives, he studied air-conditioning at a vocational school in Rishon Lezion. With Ramadan just around the corner, I noted that it must be difficult doing this kind of physical labour while fasting day in and day out for an entire month. Yussuf agreed, but added that for him it was simple because he doesn't fast.

Yossi, the oldest of the three, has been installing air conditioning for over 25 years. A divorced father of four, he lives in Anatot, a West Bank settlement just over the Green Line, northeast of Jerusalem, close enough to be considered a suburb by some. Yossi grew up in a traditional home, but no longer practises much religion. He chose Anatot because it's beautifully situated on the edge of the desert, overlooking Wadi Qelt, but mostly because he could buy a nice home there for a reasonable price. And by the way, many years ago he stopped fasting on Yom Kippur.

At the end of the day I came away rejuvenated not only because of the air conditioning. My stereotypes of haredim, Arabs and settlers had been disturbed, and it was inspiring.

I hope to remember the experience next time I'm about to pigeonhole someone.

Please stop dumbing down Israel's realities

Israel is an incredibly difficult country to understand – historically, politically, religiously, socially, geographically and in every other way. What we lack in physical space, we make up for by layers of complexity deposited over almost 4,000 years, through cycles of destruction and restoration, including the Zionist miracle.

While Israelis live with and debate this complex reality every day, many pundits and Jewish advice-givers simplify our difficult situation into a few sound bites followed by very simplistic and unrealistic solutions. They also apply analogies taken from other places and contexts, (such as the American civil rights movement and South African apartheid) and try to force-fit them to Israel's unique situation.

But there is no other case of a people exiled from its homeland in ancient times, dispersed to the four corners of the earth while maintaining its identity and coherence, and then returning to re-establish a sovereign modern nation as its neighbours try to wipe it out.

For example, when I hear or read Tom Friedman, the New York Times columnist, and Peter Beinart, another U.S.-based Jewish journalist, I'm struck by the confidence with which they present their solutions, as seen from half a world away.

Beinart, the author of The Crisis of Zionism, is a particularly harsh critic whose influence is reflected in columns in the New York Times and as a speaker in many Jewish community events.

In his book, Beinart, like others only more so, describes the settlements that began after the 1967 war as the source of the "crisis," and fervently believes that Israel alone has the power to bring peace by ending the "occupation." For him, the West Bank is not part of a disputed homeland (Judea and Samaria), or a base for mass terror if the peace process goes bad again, but "a territory where Jewish power runs wild."

Beinart couches his argument in the idealistic language of human rights, harshly attacking Israelis and American Jewish leaders for ignoring "accounts of Palestinian suffering." In this patronizing vision, Palestinians are portrayed as passive victims, incapable of moral judgment or reaching an equitable agreement with Israel. To buttress his arguments, he quotes from political NGOs whose credibility is problematic, at best.

Many complications, such as the 1948 Arab invasion, then-Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's 1967 threat to "drive the Jews into the sea," the "three nos" of the Arab League in Khartoum, numerous Israeli peace proposals that were rejected, the refugee myths, and daily incitement are glossed over as, at best, footnotes of no significance. Instead, on behalf of the "younger Americans" and Jewish students who are Beinart's primary target audience, the reference point is that for "44 years, twice a college student's life span, they have seen Israel control territory in which millions of Palestinians lack citizenship."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

These easy-to-digest versions of Israel's situation and history aren't the exception. They're the norm for many journalists and academics, a large number of them Jewish. In this manner, the complex issues related to the 20 per cent Israeli-Arab minority are reduced to entirely misleading concepts such as "discrimination" and "racism," and ignore the central impact of the wider Arab-Israel conflict. The clearly stated and repeated calls by many Israeli Arab leaders for the replacement of Israel with a so-called "state of all its citizens," which would mark the end of Zionism, are also missing from the easy-reader versions of history.

The dumbing down of Israel's complex realities extends to the treatment of efforts to create a somewhat unified Jewish framework in a society composed of dozens of groups with their own traditions and sense of right and wrong. It's far too easy for Diaspora Jews, whose understanding of these issues is limited, to criticize Israel for not being like them and continuing to grapple with issues such as the role of rabbis in politics, or army exemptions granted 64 years ago to 400 yeshiva students that have expanded to more than 100,000.

It's one thing to engage with Israel, including offering constructive criticism, but first, a little humility and some more complexity, please.

Young Jews, particularly in North America, shouldn't be deprived of the right to learn about Israeli realities beyond the sound bites and simplistic formulae.

Kohen blazed a path in Turkish journalism

Amid a profusion of newspaper stories bearing typical Turkish bylines, Sami Kohen's Jewish-sounding name stands out as a tacit triumph of merit over small-mindedness in contemporary Turkish journalism.

A foreign affairs columnist for the Istanbul daily Milliyet, Kohen is a member of a select club, being one of the rare Turkish Jews writing for a general interest Turkish-language newspaper.

When he joined Milliyet, which has a circulation of about 250,000 and is one of Turkey's biggest dailies, he quietly made history by becoming the first known Jew in modern Turkey to work for such a publication.

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

Yet his claim to fame does not solely rest on his status as a Jewish journalist in a Muslim land.

Kohen, Millyet's foreign editor from 1955 to 1992, left an indelible mark by chalking up a series of "firsts" as a journalist.

A freelance contributor to major western newspapers, he was the first Turkish reporter to cover Albania when it was still a Stalinist hermit state, the first to report from China during the Cultural Revolution, and the first to visit North Korea.

At 83, he is long past retirement age, yet he is as active as ever, contributing four columns a week to Milliyet on Turkey's foreign policy and international relations.

A slight, unassuming figure who has been on its staff since 1954, he is one of its longest-serving employees. "It's unusual for a journalist to be attached to a newspaper so long," he acknowledged.

Fluent in English, French and Ladino, the lingua franca of Jews in the Ottoman Empire until the 19th century, Kohen was raised in a journalistic milieu. His father, Albert, was founder, editor and publisher of Turkey's Voice, which he established in 1936 and was printed in Ladino and Turkish.

Kohen's first stories appeared in his father's newspaper, and after his death in 1949, he succeeded him, becoming Turkey's youngest publisher.

Since Ladino was a dying language, he converted Turkey's Voice into an-all Turkish language periodical. The tactic did not work. The paper, read by 5,000 elderly subscribers, could not meet its overhead, and Kohen closed it in 1950.While studying journalism at Istanbul University, he applied for a reporter's job, but his applications were ignored. During this era, when xenophobia and racism were common, general-interest Turkish newspapers did not hire Jews or members of Christian minorities, he noted.

Having been rejected once too often, Kohen began submitting pieces to Yeni Istanbul – a scrappy Turkish newspaper specializing in local news – while completing his university studies.

Duly impressed by his articles, the editor hired Kohen as a night editor on the foreign desk. Apart from being the sole Jew on staff, he was the first known Jewish journalist ever to work on a mainstream newspaper in Turkey since the creation of the secular Turkish republic in 1923.

Shortly after joining Yeni Istanbul, Kohen was called into the publisher's office and congratulated on his industriousness. Having buttered him up, the publisher asked Kohen whether he would adopt a Turkish pen name. To some ethnocentric readers, the byline Kohen stuck in their craw.

"I was furious," he recalled. "I almost stormed out of his office. I told him my surname is an integral component of my heritage, and I would not give it up."

The publisher relented, letting him keep his cherished Kohen byline.

"After that, I never had a problem with my name, identity or religion," said Kohen, a secular Jew who regards himself as a loyal, patriotic Turk of Jewish origin. "My colleagues have been very respectful of my Jewish identity. I've had no problems."

After joining Milliyet, a newspaper with social democratic leanings, he covered major events abroad, primarily in Europe.

In 1963, Kohen was assigned to report on an upcoming soccer match between Turkey and Albania. Since Albania did not usually admit reporters, he went officially as the team's masseur. Turkey was then one of the few countries maintaining diplomatic ties with Albania.

In 1971, following Turkey's recognition of mainland China, Kohen became the first Turkish journalist to visit China, three months before Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger set foot on Chinese soil.

Three years later, relatively fresh from reporting on the 1968 Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, he covered Turkey's invasion and occupation of northern Cypress.

While on assignment in Washington, D.C., in the early 1980s, he dropped everything to fly to Ottawa to file stories on the attempted assassination of Turkey's ambassador to Canada.

He visited North Korea in 1985, notching up another "first" in the annals of journalism in Turkey.

Always something of a workaholic, Kohen started freelancing for the Tel Aviv-based daily Maariv in the 1950s, a gig that lasted until 2000. He wrote on Israel's evolving relations with Turkey and internal Turkish affairs.

Kohen began reporting from Israel in 1950, when he wrote a seven-part series focusing on kibbutzim and the role of women in the armed forces.

"I was very impressed with all the developments in Israel and with the spirit of the people," he said, noting that Turkish newspaper coverage of Israel was usually favourable in those years. "It was such a dynamic, free society."

He returned to Israel many more times on assignments, covering, among other events, the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Kohen is less than sanguine that Israel's strained relations with Turkey, exacerbated by the 2010 Mavi Marmara affair, will improve any time soon. Asked whether Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is anti-Israel, he replied, "He might be. He opposes [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's policies, but not the Israeli people."

Kohen launched his career as a freelancer in the 1960s as a succession of American and British newspapers and magazines – notably the Christian Science Monitor, the New York Times, Newsweek, the Guardian and the Economist – tapped his expertise on Turkish and Middle Eastern affairs.

To the best of his knowledge, there are only two other Jewish journalists working in Turkey today for general-interest newspapers: Gila Benmayor, a reporter on the staff of Hurriyet, and Soli Uzel, a professor of international relations at Kadir Has University who writes a column for Haber Turk.

Israeli-Canadian to lead TSO

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Symphony Orchestra announced earlier this summer that it had chosen Shalom Bard as its new resident conductor to work along with the TSO's music director, the conductor Peter Oundjian.

Bard, 38, who was born in Haifa and moved to Toronto with his family in June 1990, is the first Israeli-Canadian to lead the orchestra.

He'll also assume the mantle of conductor of the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra (TSYO).

He applied to the orchestra through a program set up by the RBC Foundation's Emerging Artists Project, which decided to invest $400,000 in Canadian arts programs, including setting up a new, two-year resident-conductor position with the TSO.

The bank also sponsored an affiliate-composer position with the orchestra, which was filled by local composer Kevin Lau, who will also work with Bard.

The Israeli-Canadian, who is a clarinettist, comes from a family of musicians. His father is a cantor, his mother is a pianist and his brother is a violinist.

Shalom Bard

Bard sat down with The CJN at Massey Hall to discuss his new job, a smile etched on his face throughout the interview.

"This is literally a dream come true. I've daydreamed about this. I've sat as a clarinettist in the symphony. It seems like only yesterday that I used to think, 'Wouldn't it be great [to be a conductor], and now I'm here. It's amazing," he said.

The bonus, he said, is that he's conducting the TSO, an orchestra whose system he learned while guest-conducting for the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra (TSYO) and through performances as a soloist with the main orchestra over the last 15 years.

Like many artists, his life has been a journey of musical discoveries and creative growth, he said.

He started studying and playing clarinet at age 12, and within months of coming to Canada, had joined the TSYO.

By 1992, he'd graduated from the University of Toronto; then he obtained his master's degrees in orchestral conducting and clarinet performance from McGill University and the University of Southern California respectively.

After a year as second clarinettist with the TSO, Bard freelanced for various orchestras, including the Edmonton Symphony Orchestra, the Kitchener-Waterloo Chamber Orchestra and the National Ballet of Canada Orchestra.

Up to this point though, one of the highlights of his career was an invitation by Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra conductor Zubin Mehta to be his acting principal clarinettist for the 2001-02 season.

Prior to his new position with the TSO, last year, Bard honed his conducting chops with various organizations, including as resident conductor of Symphony Nova Scotia, assistant conductor for Educational Concerts with the Herbert Zipper Orchestra of Los Angeles, and one season as conductor of Toronto's Mooredale Youth Orchestra.

He said he doesn't know why the conducting bug bit him, but he knows it bit him hard.

"I do it because I must," Bard said, echoing a quote from one of his favourite poets, Rainer Maria Rilke.

Though the prep-work of a conductor is often a solitary thing – Bard said he often sits alone in his home, in silence, envisioning the composition he is about to perform in order to "get behind the notes" – the great enjoyment is then having an orchestra to use as an outlet for his vision of the score.

"An orchestra is the most magnificent palette and instrument to play with," he said. "The possibilities are endless, which is where things get complicated. It can change with the acoustics [of a venue] or with the makeup of a particular orchestra."

Bard is scheduled to conduct more than 20 concerts during the TSO's 2012-13 season.

His TSO debut will come on Oct. 20, when he conducts the orchestra and guest violinist Maxim Vengerov for performances of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade.

Asked if his conducting is informed by his Jewish and dual Israeli-Canadian heritage, he said he hoped so.

"I've been conducting now for four years and you draw into your music from your life. And being Jewish, and a proud Israeli, there's a rich culture and history full of wisdom and suffering, and music describes all those things. It's an art that points to the past as well as the future.

"The reason Beethoven's Fifth will forever be played is because… it's the rattling of change. In today's world, you see social upheaval, especially in my neighbourhood, the Middle East. So there are very contemporary ideas in those [classical] compositions. Being born in Israel makes one really wish for peace and all music has yearning. So it's easy for me to [channel] that into my work."

Bard said he hopes to be an ambassador for "all the beautiful things that are happening in Israel, and not the bad things that the media reports" from the Holy Land.

Memoir a way to 'avenge my people,' survivor says

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Max Bornstein's memoir reaches far beyond his horrific experiences during the Holocaust.

The 90-year-old's book, If Home Is Not Here, covers more than 20 years, from his birth in Warsaw in 1922 through displacement, poverty, institutionalization, antisemitism and state violence.

In an interview at the Baycrest Apotex Centre, where he has been a resident for four years, the sprightly and articulate survivor exudes joie de vivre and optimism.

Despite the disastrous odyssey of his early years, Bornstein speaks of the positive restructuring of his life in Canada – meeting his wife Minnie in Toronto, who died three years ago after 61 years of marriage, and the joy of his family, daughter Linda Warman, son Jeffrey Bornstein, two grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

When he was three months old, his family fled Poland to Berlin and then Paris so that his father could avoid the Polish army.

Two years later, Max and his pregnant mother left for Canada to be with their family in Winnipeg. As an undocumented person, his father could not legally travel to Canada.

Engulfed in poverty, Max and his sister, who was born in Winnipeg, were placed in an orphanage, where he said he was plagued by loneliness.

Disregarding all advice, his mother and the children returned to Paris in 1933 when Max was 12 years old, just as Adolf Hitler was coming to power in Europe.

When his family realized what was happening in Europe, they applied to return to Canada, but Canada had closed its doors to Jewish immigration.

Max Bornstein

Argentina accepted immigrants. His parents and sister left for Argentina, but Max was unable to leave, as he was of draft age. He was a teenager living in fear under Nazi occupation.

In his detailed memoir, he recounts his hardships and trepidations, including his mental breakdowns, unemployment and homelessness.

He also writes with humour about his episodes as a teenager developing sexual awareness and his many friendships that often gave him the strength to survive.

As the persecution of Jews increased in France, he crossed rivers and climbed mountains, finally reaching Spain. He was imprisoned by the Spanish police in three different appalling prisons and then sent to Miranda del Ebro concentration and labour camp.

In 1947, Bornstein, sponsored by his Canadian-born sister, came to Toronto. A year later, the family sponsored his parents and they were finally reunited.

"That was the most treasured reunion that I could ever recall," he said.

Bornstein began writing his memoir in 1979 when he retired as a footwear importer. He completed his book in 1990, but had difficulty finding a publisher. He was told that there were too many books about the Holocaust.

Recently, the Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program of the Azrieli Foundation, which supports a wide spectrum of initiatives, published If Home Is Not Here.

The Azrieli Foundation collects, publishes and distributes memoirs of Holocaust survivors.

Looking back, Bornstein said, "My childhood was completely overturned when my family escaped Poland to France.

"Nothing could have given me greater satisfaction than knowing that I am passing on the historical events and private challenges that a Jewish boy experiences and what it meant to live through such trauma.

"In passing on my knowledge to future generations," he stressed, "what is of utmost importance is the State of Israel and what it implies to the future of maintaining our independent state.

"What other way can I avenge my people except in presenting what happened to them?"

If Home Is Not Here is available at major book stores, universities and libraries. The proceeds from the book go back to fund the programs of the Azrieli Foundation.

Levy report affirms Israel's rights to territories

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Two years ago when U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden visited Israel, plans were announced to add 1,600 housing units to Jewish communities in East Jerusalem.

The announcement prompted a diplomatic flap, with some critics of the move arguing it needlessly embarrassed Biden during his visit. The vice-president himself said the move "undermines trust."

The imbroglio was diplomatic and political in nature, but critics of the settlements have long argued they're much more than just bad policy – they're illegal.

Israel has consistently rejected that position, and recently, a blue-ribbon panel headed by former Israeli Supreme Court justice Edmund Levy came to the same conclusion. The Commission to Examine the Status of Building In Judea and Samaria issued a report that rejected critiques of the legality of the settlements and set out a series of recommendations to regulate construction and expansion in accordance with relevant law.

"According to international law, Israelis have the legal right to settle in Judea and Samaria and that establishment of settlements cannot, in and of itself, be considered illegal," the commission concluded.

The commission, however, called on the government of Israel to clarify its settlement policy, streamline the legal process of approvals, set out a consistent set of bylaws to regulate construction and it urged establishment of a special court to adjudicate disputes.

The commission's report prompted a letter from 41 American Jews to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, urging him to reject the commission's recommendations.

"We fear that if approved, this report will place the two-state solution, and the prestige of Israel as a democratic member of the international community, in peril," the letter states.

The U.S. administration was also critical of the report. State Department spokesperson Patrick Ventrell was quoted as saying, "Obviously, we've seen the reports that an Israeli government appointed panel has recommended legalizing dozens of Israeli settlements in the West Bank, but we do not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlement activity and we oppose any effort to legalize settlement outposts."

Alan Baker

Alan Baker, a member of the commission and the former Israeli ambassador to Canada, said the commission was set up to clear "the confusion with regard to building in the territories" and to find "how to put things in order."

Over a five-month period, the three-person panel heard from hundreds of witnesses spanning the political spectrum. Among them were representatives of Israel's extreme left and right wings – "the more left-wing organizations that appeared said the concept of settlements in the territories was illegal under international law," Baker stated.

That led the panel to look into the historical rights pertaining to the West Bank, while considering international law and conventions. The group investigated whether Israel "occupied" the territories, whether it had violated the Fourth Geneva Convention by "transferring" a population there and whether Israelis could legally reside in the area.

The commission found that prior to 1967, there was no legitimate sovereign in control of the territories. Jordan exercised control, but it had no right to do so, and at any rate, it voluntarily relinquished any rights it possessed in 1988. Since there was no sovereign from which Israel seized the land, it did not meet the international definition of an occupying power, Baker said.

Furthermore, there was no transfer of populations by the government of Israel into the territories that met the Geneva Convention definition, which was meant to address forced transfers into others' sovereign territory, Baker said.

The commission examined claims to the territories and found that Israel's derived from the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which after World War I, was enshrined into international law at the San Remo Conference and adopted by the League of Nations and later by the United Nations.

"We concluded that Israel has very solid, well-based rights," he said.

"That does not mean that Palestinians don't have rights. They claim self-determination, and for that reason, Israel has not annexed the territories," Baker said.

Israel has the legal right to the territories, he continued, but it is willing to negotiate with the Palestinians to establish a final determination of rights.

"In the meantime, there is nothing to prevent Israelis from living in the territories, as long as its done legally and no Palestinian private property is taken."

In their letter to Netanyahu, the American Jewish writers state, "Securing Israel's future as a Jewish and democratic state requires diplomatic and political leadership, not legal manoeuvrings. We recognize and regret that the Palestinian Authority has abdicated leadership by not returning to the negotiating table. Nonetheless, our great fear is that the Levy Report will not strengthen Israel's position in this conflict, but rather add fuel to those who seek to delegitimize Israel's right to exist. At this moment, it is more critical than ever that Israel strengthen its claim in the international community that it is committed to a two-state vision, which is, in turn, central to Israel's future as a Jewish and democratic state."

The letter is signed by, among others, several members of the Israel Policy Forum (IPF), which describes itself as "an American non-profit, non-partisan organization that provides resources and advocacy for a strong, Jewish and democratic state at peace with its neighbours."

One of the signatories is Rabbi Daniel Gordis, senior vice-president and the Koret Distinguished Fellow at the Shalem Centre in Jerusalem

He writes on the IPC website, "I'm seen as slightly right of centre on Israel, and so people were shocked that I signed the letter."

He said that he added his name to the letter because "I felt then, and still believe, that adopting the report would alienate many American Jews struggling to feel and express support for Israel; I feared it would unleash an international backlash that Israel does not need, particularly now, and I worried that it would harden even further the sense among some Israelis that we can continue to progress without a serious strategic conversation about Israel's borders and their relationship to our democracy.

"As I made clear in a subsequent oped, I'm no attorney, so I'm not an expert on the legal conclusions of the Levy Commission. But I do spend a great deal of time with young American Jews. Increasingly, I see them struggling to maintain feelings of loyalty to Israel as they grapple with what they believe is Israel's failure to move the peace process forward… I saw no reason to breed further hemorrhaging of American Jewish support for Israel or an international outcry by adopting a report that many would see as cementing the current status quo, leading to rampant accusations that Israel is becoming an apartheid society. Israel does not need that."

A different perspective was offered by Avi Bell of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies (BESA). He notes that "the report's argument is surprisingly modest in substance. It does little more than endorse the traditional official Israeli position that the Fourth Geneva Convention does not apply de jure to the West Bank and in any event does not bar Israeli settlements.

"Some have argued that the Levy report is foolish politically, arguing that by asserting its legal rights, Israel will signal it is unwilling to entertain 'land for peace' compromises. This seems a doubtful thesis. Israel has asserted its legal rights to Jerusalem for decades, but yet repeatedly offered compromises on its rights in the city.

"What the Levy report has done is to reinvigorate the discussion of the legitimacy of Israel's position under international law after many years in which Israel has been silent about its legal rights. This is a welcome development."

In a written response to the IPF, Baker states, "There is nothing in the report that could in any way be interpreted as placing the 'two-state solution' in peril. The opposite is in fact the case. The report reiterates… that despite Israel's well-based and solid legal and historic claims to sovereignty over the area, and the right of Israelis to settle therein in accordance with the requisite legal norms and requirements, as set out in the body of the report, consecutive Israeli governments have chosen to opt, and continue to opt in favour of conducting bone fide and pragmatic negotiations with the representatives of the Palestinian people and the Arab states, with a view to determine the fate of the area."

Baker told The CJN that the letter to Netanyahu "is a political statement and has nothing to do with our recommendations, which ensures that whoever builds in the territories does it according to law."

Author pessimistic about Israeli-Palestinian peace

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A retired sociology professor says it's time Israel gives up on the delusion that the Palestinians will be their partner in peace, and do what it must to ensure the safety and security of the people who live in the Holy Land.

Stephen Schecter, who taught at the Université du Québec à Montréal for more than three decades and authored six books, as well as short stories and poetry in both English and French will be in Toronto Aug. 9 to promote his latest book, Grasshoppers in Zion: Israel and the Paradox of Modernity.

Stephen Schecter

He takes a hardline approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, suggesting that Israel needs to take its fate into its own hands by flexing its political and military muscle.

Schecter, who will be coming from his home in Vancouver for a book signing at Israel's Judaica store in Thornhill, Ont., shared his controversial views about Israel and the Arab world.

He said societies like ours, which thrive on liberalism, pluralism and tolerance, often misread the situation in the Middle East because they fail to realize that Palestinian society is organized on totally different principles.

He said because academics, journalists and foreign policy experts try to understand the conflict based on expectations they have for the way western democratic societies would behave, "they keep indulging [Palestinians] in their murderous, genocidal, racist, Jew-hating behaviour, and they keep insisting on seeing them as potential peace partners – and they will look for moderates where there are none."

Schecter, who said he has often been accused of holding racist views, insisted that he considers Palestinians "no different than anyone else when it comes to the passions that tear them apart, when it comes to the blood that flows in their veins."

But, he added, people on either side of the political spectrum should realize that Israel doesn't have a partner for peace.

"If you look at the Israeli governments from left to right, they have continued to espouse the idea of a peace process when any intelligent analysis of the situation would indicate that this is not in the cards and will not be for a couple of hundred years," Schecter said.

"How many times do you need to be disappointed before you change your tune?"

He said Israel's biggest mistake is to expect that it has the power to change the Palestinians' behaviour if they're not receptive to change.

"You can't even do that in a modern society... The Israeli government, in my opinion, should base its policy on things that it can control, rather than trying to modify Palestinian behaviour, when it's not going to be modified," he said.

Schecter suggested that Israel annex Judea and Samaria, also known as the West Bank.

"What they do with the Arabs there is a different story – my preference would be to let them leave... They've been so indoctrinated now into Jew-hatred and bloodlust that I don't think it's good to have them inside the country."

He added that he can't comprehend why Jews allow the world to think it's OK for Jews to be murdered simply for living in their own country and said Israel needs to "take initiative, defend itself, create the borders that are necessary for your security... Learn to assert national sovereignty. But Jews don't operate like that."

He said Israelis should not apologize for the existence of Israel.

"They should say this is our land. This is ours. It was given to us by God, it was given to us by international law, it was given to us by our enterprising and pioneering spirits, it was given to us by sacrifice and countless wars and we're here and we're keeping it," Schecter said.

"The Arab Muslim world reacts when you exert authority – firm authority that's in line with what the situation warrants."

Confronting history in Berlin

My View

Lawrence Hart

For many Jews, and more especially those in the older demographic, the very prospect of going to Germany arouses feelings of ambivalence, if not consternation. For some, even setting foot in the land that spawned Hitler's Reich and the near total annihilation of European Jewry would be unthinkable. There is, of course, the competing viewpoint that encourages Jews to visit the country, if only to see how a new generation has grappled with its past, to listen, to learn, and, above all, to remember not only those who went to their deaths but also those who heroically risked their own lives to save the precious few who were able to evade the Nazi onslaught.

I recently had an opportunity to spend some time in Berlin, primarily to attend a conference. I was there for just a few days, but they were a days filled with overwhelmingly mixed emotions. At first glance, the city is like many others in Europe, with a distinctive architecture, tree-lined boulevards, efficient transportation, eclectic eateries and bustling commercial districts. Since 1990, when the infamous wall that cut through its core was demolished, there has been extensive construction and development to make its reunification as seamless as possible and, at least in the eyes of the visitor, it's apparent that such efforts have been successful.

Yet despite its urban makeover, Berlin has also been referred to as a city of ghosts. Germany's wartime past, and perhaps most particularly the decimation of its Jewish community, has cast an eternal shadow on its capital city. So much so that it's difficult to pass one or another train station or open square without seeing reference to, or sometimes just imagining, such locations as assembly points for those who were deported to the Nazi extermination camps.

Several Holocaust memorials dot the city. Most notable among them is the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, located just a block from the Brandenburg Gate, and the nearby Jewish Museum, with its distinctive shape, "reminiscent of a warped Star of David."

But aside from these more prominent structures, there are, in both East and West Berlin, a multitude of smaller landmarks that poignantly memorialize victims of the Holocaust. So whether you choose to explore the Jewish cemetery where philosopher Moses Mendelssohn is buried (and which was desecrated by the Nazis), or wander through the restored workshop of Righteous among the Nations, Otto Weidt, who protected many physically disabled Jews from the Gestapo, or spend some time at the sites of destroyed synagogues or community centres, you'll find solemn tributes to those who perished.

It's recognized that, unlike most other countries where Jews were persecuted during the war, Germany, in principle and policy, has chosen to confront, rather than dismiss or rationalize, its role in the Holocaust. In fact, what struck me most powerfully when visiting the various memorials in Berlin was the presence not so much of tourists, but much more so of groups of young Germans, particularly of school age, who were obviously there to be educated, to reflect and, I suspect, to somehow try to come to terms with that dark and ignominious page in their history.

Jewish apps for iPhones and iPads

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Today, an overview of some recent Jewish apps for your iPhone or iPad. All are free unless otherwise noted.

• [Hillel] would also say: if I am not for myself, who is for me? And if I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when? (Avot 1:14)

• "He who guards his mouth guards his soul. One who opens his lips wide comes to ruin." (Proverbs 13:3)

If you want to carry a little – actually, a lot – of wisdom with you wherever you go, here are two apps for you. You are probably already familiar with some of the teachings of Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers), such as the famous one quoted above. The free app includes all six chapters in both English and Hebrew, along with insights and background. [http://bit.ly/jewapp1]

Daily Proverb provides selections from Solomon's book. This English-only app allows you to bookmark your favourite Proverbs and even has a tool to assist you to memorize them. [http://bit.ly/jewapp2]

iComfort ($1.99) demystifes the Jewish laws of mourning. It provides an overview of the stages of mourning (funeral preparation, shivah, shloshim, yahrzeit), advice on comforting a mourner and provides the basic prayers related to mourning, including an audio version of Kaddish. [http://bit.ly/jewapp3]

Kever Pointer App – A Virtual Visit To The Grave ($.99): This is an odd one. It includes interesting background information about the Patriarchs and Matriarchs, as well as historic Jewish figures from the Temple period to the modern era. Since Jews pray toward Jerusalem, I am puzzled by the "Pointer" part of the app, which includes a compass that indicates the direction toward the individual's resting place. [http://bit.ly/jewapp4]

Torahific ($.99) provides riddles about each weekly Torah portion. Questions are drawn from the midrash, Rashi and other classical commentators:

Q: Adam named all the creatures according to their unique nature. Why did he name the dog "kelev"?

A: A dog is called "kelev," which means "kol lev" (all heart). This name thus describes the loyalty and love that a dog possesses for its owner (and for no one else!)... The name of this creature should inspire us also to be completely faithful and loving to our Master. [http://bit.ly/jewapp8]

Do you know a bar mitzvah boy who's about to start laying tfillin? Or perhaps someone who wants to restart the tradition? Here are three apps for you. MyTeffilin includes English/Hebrew background about the mitzvah along with clear step-by-step instructions for laying the arm and the head tfillin. [http://bit.ly/jewapp5]

About Tefillin provides the blessings and the Shema in Hebrew and transliterated into six languages (Hebrew, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Persian and Russian). There are links to videos about laying tfillin, including British Chief Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks on the importance of the mitzvah. [http://bit.ly/jewapp6]

When donning tfillin, placement is key. In the old days, you might ask a friend or use a mirror to make sure the head tfillin is sitting properly. But why use a friend or a mirror when you can go high tech? Power up Tefillin Mirror, lift your iPhone or iPad and you'll see an image of your face along with three vertical lines to help ensure your tffillin is aligned. [http://bit.ly/jewapp7]

A proposal on prenuptial agreements

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"And you shall remember HaShem, your God, for it is He Who gives you the strength to act valiantly" (Deut. 8:18). This verse, which appears in our parshat ha-shavuah, is invoked by Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (Iggerot Mosheh, Orach Chaim 2:111) as justification for human beings to draft insurance contracts. The Creator has given humankind the creative wisdom to devise insurance programs that benefit society. The verse teaches us to draft commercially appropriate insurance contracts and that, while doing so, we must give thanks to the Creator for granting us the ability to conceive of these policies, Rabbi Feinstein declares.

The same is assuredly true for drafting prenuptial agreements that champion the welfare of the righteous women of Israel. In the article "May we all be 'Hartmanized'" that I was privileged to publish in The CJN on Jan. 19, 2012, I presented a proposal to that effect. Since then, I have received illuminating feedback from sagacious CJN readers recommending improvements to my essay. There is no greater compliment possible to this newspaper's readership!

As such, the second edition – revised and corrected – of my proposal is now available at http://www.wepapers.com/Papers/443780/Prenuptial_Agreements.

My proposal essentially consists of two prenuptial agreements.

First, in order for a sefer keritut (bill of divorce required by Torah law to dissolve the marriage between two Jews) to be valid, there must be no financial coercion imposed on the husband. The first prenuptial agreement therefore, shields, the prospective bride and groom – before they contract their marriage – from any government legislation or judicial decisions that may be interpreted as depriving the husband of money in the event of any marital disagreement. Such legislation/judicial rulings could render the bride an agunah, but a prenuptial agreement will presciently solve the dilemma by granting the bride and groom freedom of religious conscience.

Second, in order to financially empower the bride, she can be given (if the groom so offers before the wedding) a prenuptial agreement of tosefet mezonot (enhanced daily allowance), as was Rebecca our Matriarch, as recorded by Rashi in commentary on Genesis 27:9. Rabbi Yaakov Kamenetzky encouraged the implementation of such a prenuptial agreement, but it's necessary to diamond-polish Rabbi Kamenetzky's proposal so that it conforms with the consensus of poskim. Under a modified version of Rabbi Kamenetzky's scheme (presented in my essay), every day that the husband and wife live in harmony, the husband would give his wife a large sum of money. (Of course, nothing is given on the Sabbath or festivals.) The wife thus controls the purse strings of the marriage. When marital harmony dissolves, although the wife is not entitled to any further allowance, she now possesses the extensive wealth necessary to offer to pay her husband for a sefer keritut, which will be kosher if the husband so agrees.

Accordingly, let us thank the Creator who has given the readership of CJN and myself, working co-operatively together, "the strength to act valiantly" in publishing such a proposal to benefit the righteous women of Israel.

Rediscovering Michel de Montaigne

What do you know about Michel de Montaigne (1533-92)?

He was a nobleman, government official, mayor of Bordeaux and wine grower who lived in the Perigord area of southwestern Frances for six decades.

His mother descended from a Spanish Jewish family that lived in Aragon at the height of the Inquisition in the late 15th century. Three members of his family were burned at the stake. They were prominent Marranos who had gone through the motions of conversion, but continued to practise Judaism secretly.

Daniel J. Boorstin, in his book The Creators writes, "The Marrano memory could not have been lost on Michel. He frequently expressed his sense of the injustice done to the Jews, which confirms his doubts on force as an effective agent of persuasion."

In recent years there has been a spirited renewal of interest in Montaigne and his singular achievements.

For 36 years, a hideous religious civil war between Catholics and Protestants had turned France into a charnel house.

In 1571, having witnessed such atrocities as "make me blanch with horror," Montaigne retired from society. He built a quiet, bucolic study, began to write his essays and modestly adopted for his motto "Que sais je?" "What do I know?"

In her splendid recent book about Montaigne, Sarah Bakewell explains that there was no precedent in literature for his essays – casual, formalistic reflections. They were mostly brief and "Into them he put whatever was in his head: His tastes in wine and food, his childhood memories, his playful cat and the way his dog's ears twitched when he was dreaming. All of this, as well as terse accounts of the political, social and religious events around him."

He hated cruelty in any form. He abhorred bigotry and attacked the persecution of witches. He was so pantheistic in his vision that he could write, "There is… a certain respect and a general duty of humanity not only to beasts that have life and sense, but even to trees and plants."

What follows are ideas from his essays that provide the thrust of his thought on many subjects:

• Man is certainly stark mad. He cannot make a flea, and yet he will make Gods by the dozen.

• How many things that served us yesterday, as articles of faith, today are fables?

• Few men dare publish to the world the prayers they make to Almighty God.

• Nothing is so firmly built as that which we least know.

• Fame and tranquility can never be bedfellows.

• As to fidelity, there is no animal in the world so treacherous as man.

• The man who tries to please the multitude is never done.

• The greatest thing in the world is to know how to be self-sufficient. Emerson called Montaigne the most honest of all writers. He wrote, "Cut these words, and they would bleed."

Boorstin, in summing up Montaigne's life and thought, offers this tribute: "His enduring miracle to me is this, who picks up his essays in whatever time or circumstance finds them contemporary."

Decision pending on whether rally will go ahead

"FSWC believes that while free speech is an essential component of a democratic society, the provincial government should not sanction organizations calling for war, death and hate towards Jews by permitting the use of public property for such a purpose," Benlolo stated.

'We believe this is not about free speech. It's about promoting hatred'

Rick Boon, operations manager of the Legislative Security Service, acknowledged "there is an application put in for the 18th, but no decision has been made on it yet."

He said the legislature maintains guidelines for use of the premises, which includes a provision that "the property itself has to be enjoyed by a number of groups, including small children."

For larger events, legislative security consults with Toronto police to determine if the event will comply with the guidelines, he added.

Film of last year's rally showed Imam Zafar Bangash of the Islamic Society of York Region saying that U.S. President Barack Obama "would rather have Americans starve to death, but he cannot say no to the Zionist parasitical state."

Bangash referred to the United States as a "stooge government" and to Obama as "this black man in the White House."

He went on to call Zionists "racist," "inhuman," and "barbarians."

Maulana Asad Jafri, described as a Khomeinist student from Qoms, Iran, said "whenever you see injustice happen, there is a one per cent, two per cent, 100 per cent involvement by the Zionist regime, the same Zionist regime that sucks the resources, the blood and everything that belongs to the people all across the world."

Avi Benlolo

Another speaker referred to Israel as a spreading cancer that either dies, takes the host body with it, or is itself killed.

Benlolo said, "We believe this is not about free speech. It's about promoting hatred. Beyond the law, Canadian society finds it abhorrent and shocking that people could stand on public grounds and spew hateful ideology that's clearly antisemitic."

McDonald likewise rejected suggestions that denying organizers a permit to gather would violate their free speech rights. Demonstrators can march elsewhere, he said, but Queen's Park has its own policy on permissible gatherings and that should be applied.

Last year's rally included the participation of Karin Brothers, a member of Bloor Street United Church's social justice committee.

After she was shown on the video telling participants that "we need you," the United Church issued a statement distancing itself from her.

Brothers spoke on her own behalf and not for the church, said church spokesperson Rev. Bruce Gregersen.

CTV Games announcers take principled stand

Kudos to CTV's Brian Williams and Lisa LaFlamme, anchors for the network's coverage of the 2012 London Olympics, for their principled stand during the July 27 opening ceremonies. Commemorating 40 years since the Munich Massacre, in which 11 Israeli athletes and coaches were murdered at the 1972 Olympics – something International Olympic Committee president Jacques Rogge has refused to do with a moment of silence at the opening event – Williams said the following as the Israeli athletes entered the stadium:

"My position is well known and it is one that I have taken in previous Olympics. It is wrong that the IOC refuses to have a minute's silence for the Israeli athletes that were slaughtered in Munich. It is a much bigger issue this year, as it's the 40th anniversary of Munich. Members of the Canadian government [and] yesterday our Governor General all called for a moment's silence. Dr. Rogge says the ceremony is not the place to remember a tragic event, but it [was] tragic. It's one of the most significant and world-changing events in Olympic history. It absolutely should have been done here. The IOC worries about politics? This event is political by its very nature."

LaFlamme noted: "The widow of one of the victims spoke out saying 'they came with dreams, they went home in coffins.' They want to be remembered here tonight."

"And remember," Williams added, "they died as Olympians."

Last Tuesday, what seemed on the surface to be a small but important gesture from Egypt's new president Mohammed Morsi to Israel almost immediately created a storm of controversy and confusion.

What's at issue is whether Morsi, as first announced by Israeli President Shimon Peres' office on July 31, actually sent a letter thanking Peres for his Ramadan greetings and expressing hope in renewing the peace process "in order to achieve security and stability for all peoples in the region, including [the] Israeli people."

The letter, which came by fax to Peres' office from Egypt's embassy in Tel Aviv, bore the unsigned name and title of the Egyptian president. However, as soon as its contents became public (it was printed in the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot), Morsi's spokesman Yasser Ali denounced the letter as fake and a "slander."

The vehemence with which his denial came was especially disconcerting to Israeli officials, some of whom interpreted the letter as an encouraging sign that, even though the Egyptian president comes from the Muslim Brotherhood which is hostile to Israel, all might not be lost, as feared, in Egypt-Israel relations. (Those relations, after all, under the "friendly" former president Hosni Mubarak, were cold at the best of times.)

Mohammed Morsi

According to the Israeli media, the Egyptian embassy gave permission for Peres' office to release the letter.

This led many journalists, both in Israel and abroad, to surmise that beyond the question of Egypt-Israel relations, what's also at play here are internal Egyptian politics, in particular the dynamic unfolding between Morsi's office and the military. Both are vying for power and control in a period of an unclear modus vivendi following the recent democratic elections (and limitations placed on those results by the army leadership).

A Cairo-based analyst who wishes to remain anonymous offered the following observations in a private exchange: "As to the truth of the letter, it's clear to me that the letter is genuine – that it came from the Egyptian Embassy. The only question is whether Morsi approved it. I don't have a clear answer on that. Among the possibilities: the Foreign Ministry is still in the hands of Mubarak-era people, and this would be a way to embarrass Morsi. Israeli diplomats are well received at the Foreign Ministry, Brotherhood or no Brotherhood. The other possibility is that Morsi's people approved it verbally and kept plausible deniability for local consumption. Note the wording that refers to peace for the Israeli people, not for Israel. I don't know which one it is, but I'm sure that Israel didn't forge this, and neither did Yediot Achronot."

Jews will almost certainly vote Liberal – again

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Analysis

MONTREAL — With a Quebec election slated for Sept. 4, the day after Labour Day, indications are that the province's Jewish community will once again be among the Liberal government's most dependable supporters at the ballot box – even if they're holding their noses.

Premier Jean Charest dissolved the national assembly last week in order to seek a fourth straight mandate, and the Jewish community, like many other Quebecers, seems to have grown weary and cynical about allegations of widespread corruption in the construction industry, alleged "French-only" treatment of anglophones when dealing with Quebec officials, skyrocketing taxes and collapsing road infrastructure.

But that doesn't mean the vast majority of Quebec Jews – who almost all live in Montreal's west end, as well as in West Island ridings – will vote for anyone other than Liberal candidates.

Quebec Jews seem glumly resigned to the real possibility that the next government could be led by the Parti Québécois, which is never a welcome development for a staunchly federalist community that has already endured two referendums on sovereignty.

In general, ties between the community and Charest have been strong, even though Jewish leaders did meet twice over the past year with officials from the Coalition d'avenir du Québec (CAQ), a new party that's seeking Jewish – and other Quebecers' – votes.

Pundits were speculating last week that either of the two main parties could prevail – possibly with a minority government – although the PQ had been clinging to a slight lead, and most political handicappers were predicting a PQ victory, despite the reported unpopularity of its leader, Pauline Marois.

In west-end D'Arcy McGee, the only majority-Jewish riding in the province, veteran Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, 71, can safely rely on constituents voting him in for a sixth term.

In the last provincial election, in 2008, Bergman garnered almost 90 per cent of the vote, and his level of support has almost always been that high since he was first elected in 1994 with a low-by-comparison 65 per cent of the vote, ahead of Equality Party leader Robert Libman.

In April, Bergman had no challenger at the riding's Liberal nomination meeting, held at a local synagogue. One of his strongest supporters has been community leader and CJN board member Steven Cummings.

Bergman, who most recently had been serving as chair of the government caucus, has been credited with persuading Charest to approve construction of Pavilion K at the Jewish General Hospital. The Liberal government contributed $95 million to the project, in addition to pledging another $300 million for three other construction phases at the hospital through 2016.

Bergman has also reportedly had Charest's ear, meeting with him every Tuesday morning for 90 minutes.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation said that while it's too early to say which party will win, "we look forward to an election where there is a high-minded debate on the issues facing Quebecers."

In an apparent reference to "reasonable accommodation," an issue that divided minority and majority Quebecers and was prominent in 2008, Rabbi Poupko said: "We hope that no politicians would try to appeal to nativist or xenophobic sentiment that exists among a small minority of Quebecers."

Jewish, Arab Israelis meet at Canadian camp

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

Eyes bright and full of hope, 14-year-old Mahmoud is eager to talk about his life-changing camp experience at a two-week summer program held at Camp Shomria in Perth, Ont.

Mahmoud, who spoke at a recent closing reception in downtown Toronto for the Heart to Heart program at the camp, is one of the 20 Jewish Israeli and Arab Israeli youths between the ages of 14 and 16 who participated in the program.

"It's so beautiful to meet Jewish boys and girls. After being with them, we are a family now and I love them," Mahmoud said, beaming.

Now in its second year, Heart to Heart is an extension of a larger Israeli educational program, Children Teaching Children (CTC), established more than 25 years ago.

CTC is operated and funded by Givat Haviva (www.givathaviva.org.il), a non-profit organization created in 1949 as a national education centre for the Kibbutz Federation in Israel.

CTC facilitates Arab and Jewish encounters for middle-school-age children throughout the Wadi Ara region, to nurture an open dialogue between the two groups.

Yaniv Sagee, shaliach for Givat Haviva and Hashomer Hatzair in the United States, and soon to be director of Givat Haviva in Israel, helped launch Heart to Heart, recognizing the importance of having Jewish and Arab Israeli adolescents meeting in Canada, away from the ongoing pressures and politics of living in Israel.

At Camp Shomria, Israeli campers have the opportunity to integrate with Canadian campers yet can still focus on their daily educational group activities guided by both Israeli and Arab counsellors.

Heart to Heart participant Guy, 15, was thrilled to simply hang out in his cabin with his new friends after a long day of programs and discussion.

"Now, it's easy to understand each other's point of view," he said. "That's one of the things we don't have in Israel because it's hard to meet with Arabic kids. We live in our own cities and there's usually no mixing."

Shahin, another Arab-Israeli Heart to Heart camper, also never had the chance to meet Jewish children his age before the program and didn't expect to make such good friends, but was very happy he did.

Participants in Heart to Heart

Lina, an Arab-Israeli girl, was extremely touched when her new Jewish friends waited for them to break the month-long fast of Ramadan.

Sagee believes that having an integrated camp like Heart to Heart also benefits Canadian campers, giving them a "unique opportunity to see Israel through the lens of both its Arab and Jewish citizens."

He is optimistic that CTC will one day become a national program, so that more students such as Mahmoud and Guy will have the chance to recognize and explore their similar cultures and perhaps even become friends.

Program director of Heart to Heart, Zakaria Mahameed, who accompanied the group from Israel, was himself an Arab participant of a similar integrated program some 15 years ago and knows first-hand the success of such initiatives.

He especially loves to see Arab and Jewish parents of Heart to Heart campers connecting back home in Israel.

When asked about staying in touch with the Jewish members of the group after camp, Mahmoud smiled and talked about plans for two big parties when they return to Israel. One gathering will be hosted in a Jewish house and the other in an Arab home.

Mahmoud also dreams of peace.

"Many people in the world think that the Arab and Jewish people hate each other, but it's not all of them. We want to change people's minds and show them that we can live together and love each other," he said.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

I have been writing this column for six years now. It has been a joy, a privilege and an honour to have this little corner to talk about everything to do with finding your bliss.

The day the idea for the column was accepted by the editor was one of the happiest of my life. I was so grateful to the editor and his staff for their support, belief in me and confidence in the topic.

It has been thrilling to impart the wisdom of all of the wonderful authors, speakers and thinkers on subjects such as happiness, gratitude, kindness and overall well-being.

At first, I quoted a lot of the spiritual thinkers of our time, but then gradually my confidence grew, until I was able to write a column in my own voice, and that was a thrilling realization. Then came the emails and lovely comments of appreciation from readers, and people stopping me always to say, "I read your column. I loved it. We clip your columns and enjoy the feeling-good messages in each one."

So after six years, this is going to be my last column.

To all of my readers, I thank you for your loyalty and support. A special thank-you goes to a man I've never met, who clipped every one of my columns and pasted them into a scrapbook that he reads often, enjoys and shares with others. I thank my incredible husband, Cliff, for his insight and editing suggestions. A thank-you to my wonderful children, Max and Lily, for their excitement and for being the inspiration for many of the columns, along with many of our friends, who gave me ideas, suggestions and even made it into the column!

But this column would have never have happened without a real inspiration. This column is dedicated to my father, Herbert E. Siblin, whose goodness, kindness, integrity, honesty and overall humanity was the basis for what this column is and what my life is all about.

Anyone who knows my dad will agree that his generosity of spirit, ethics and goodness are apparent in all he does. And so his way of being has always been a beacon of light, and this column was a way to share that. He would often rejoice in the columns, not even realizing that he infused almost every one of them, by just being a persona grata, the prince of a man that he is.

I'll never forget when our family visited Israel for the first time and I wrote a column about it. My dad called immediately after reading the column and was very emotional. He told me he loved the column and that he had tears in his eyes when he read it.

I've learned a lot from my dad, including that being outwardly focused is a wonderful way to be, that being a mensch will always be the right choice and that you will always find happiness in bringing happiness to others. He also taught me that when it's time to say goodbye, smile, be brave, be grateful and cheerful, and try to set a good example for others.

Dad, thank you for that wonderful advice, and I will continue to try to follow in your footsteps in every way that I can.

To my readers, I wish you all of life's blessings, happiness and bliss always.

With love and gratitude, Judy Librach

Too hot to make dessert? Try an ice-box cake

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

Anyone who knows me knows I am a huge fan of dessert. In fact, if given the choice, I'll eat it first. While baking something is my typical modus operandi, when the temperature and humidity start edging toward thermonuclear meltdown, I lean less toward cooking and more toward how cold I can make the sweet for the end of my meal.

I suggest we all head straight to the quaintly named ice-box cake. For those of us not born before the 1930s, an ice-box was the storage unit that was the precursor to the refrigerator where big blocks of ice were delivered to the home to place in the "ice box" to keep food cold.

Ice-box cake is a slight misnomer. It's usually a dessert-like recipe that contains custard or curd or whipped cream layered between cake, graham crackers, cookies or graham cracker or cookie crumbs. These layers "rest" or "set up" in the refrigerator (as opposed to the freezer) for several hours or overnight so that all the ingredients evolve into a single, luscious, creamy, cake-like dessert that will remind you of an éclair, cake, cookie and the best thing you've ever eaten, all rolled into mouthful after mouthful of delicious.

The easy part is putting together your ice-box treat. For expediency sake, most people usually opt for store bought cookies or cakes for the key ingredient because, like me, they don't want to cook when it's too hot. Sometimes, though, you do have to make the cake or cookie, as it's a key ingredient of the recipe. That said, I typically make my own whipped cream, custard, curd or pudding because I'm not a big fan of their "imitation" flavours. I also usually avoid recipes that require gelatin – I'm not a big fan of the texture it creates.

Most of the following recipes are quite flexible and forgiving when it comes to the ingredients. You have the luxury – dare I say freedom – to interchange most of the ingredients and individualize your creations according to your (or your guests') preferences. Hate strawberries? Use raspberries or blackberries. Don't like chocolate cookies? Use vanilla or pecan. Lactose intolerant? Get the non-dairy whipped topping. Just remember, no matter what you put together, cold in very hot weather is always delicious. I am, however, making no comment on the number of calories you will consume when you decide that leftovers are just not an option.

CHOCOLATE AND CREAM CHEESE ICE-BOX CAKE

1 package (18-1/4 oz.) chocolate cake mix
1 egg
1/2 cup butter, melted
1/2 cup chopped pecans
1 package (8 oz.) cream cheese, softened
1 cup sugar
1 carton (12 oz.) frozen whipped topping, thawed, divided
3 cups cold milk
2 packages (3.4 oz. each) instant vanilla pudding mix
1/4 tsp. ground nutmeg
1/4 tsp. rum extract
2 tbsp. chopped pecans, toasted

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x13-in. baking pan. In a large bowl, combine the cake mix, egg, butter and pecans until they form a crumb mixture. Press the mixture into the prepared pan. Bake for 15 to 20 minutes. Cool completely.

In the bowl of an electric mixer or food processor combine the cream cheese and sugar and beat or process for about 2 minutes or until combined. By hand, fold in 1 cup of the whipped topping. Spread the mixture over the top of the cooled crust. Refrigerate for 10 minutes.

In another large bowl, whisk milk and pudding mix for 2 minutes. Let stand for 2 minutes or until soft set. Stir in nutmeg and extract. Spread over cream cheese layer. Top with remaining whipped topping. Sprinkle with pecans. Refrigerate for at least 2 hours. Serves 16.

It's not quite an ice-box cake, but the Devil's Food White-Out Cake from Baking From My Home To Yours by Dorie Greenspan (Houghton Mifflin Company, 2006) also features delicious layers of chocolate and cream.

ICE-BOX CAKE

3 cups heavy cream
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. vanilla extract
2 (9-oz.) packages chocolate wafer cookies
unsweetened cocoa (or chocolate shavings)

In a large bowl, beat cream, sugar and vanilla with an electric mixer on high speed until soft peaks form.

On a flat serving plate, arrange 7 cookies side by side in a circle, keeping 1 cookie in the centre. Spread with 1/2 cup whipped cream, making a 7-inch circle. Repeat with remaining cookies and cream, making 11 layers of cookies and ending with a layer of cream (there will be a few cookies left over). Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate overnight. To serve, dust top lightly with cocoa powder or chocolate shavings.

Adapted from The Magnolia Bakery Cookbook

STRAWBERRY ICE-BOX CAKE WITH FUDGE DRIZZLE

2 lb. fresh strawberries, washed, hulled and sliced thin (save 5 or 6 whole ones for garnish)
3-1/4 cups whipping cream, divided (3 cups + 1/4 cup)
2/3 cup powdered sugar, divided (1/3 + 1/3)
1 tsp. vanilla
24 to 28 whole graham crackers (package of about 19 oz.)
2 oz. dark chocolate, finely chopped
1 tbsp. butter

In the bowl of an electric mixer, whip 3 cups of cream until they form medium peaks. Add 1/3 cup powdered sugar and vanilla and whip to stiff peaks.

Spread a dollop of the whipped cream on the bottom of a 9x13-in. baking pan. Place six graham crackers on top of the whipped cream. Gently spread more whipped cream on top of the graham crackers. Place a layer of sliced strawberries on top. Repeat this process to create three more layers (total four layers of graham crackers and 3 layers of strawberry slices). End with a layer of whipped cream.

To make the frosting: in a microwave bowl, combine the chocolate, butter and 1/4 cup cream. Heat just until the chocolate and butter melt. Whisk slightly and then add the remaining powdered sugar. Whisk vigorously to remove any lumps. If there are lumps, microwave for 10 seconds and whisk again. Drizzle the fudge frosting over the top. Refrigerate for at least four hours. Garnish with the whole berries. Serves 10 to 12.

STRAWBERRY PRETZEL ICE BOX PIE

I saw a version of this recipe in a magazine a few weeks ago and just had to make it. It was amazing!

2 cups finely crushed pretzel sticks
3/4 cup butter, melted
1/4 cup firmly packed brown sugar
2 cups sliced fresh strawberries
1 (14-oz.) can sweetened condensed milk
1/2 (8-oz.) package cream cheese, softened
2 cups whipping cream, divided
1/3 cup granulated sugar

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl combine the crushed pretzels, melted butter and brown sugar then firmly press mixture on bottom, up sides, and onto lip of a lightly greased 10-inch pie plate. Bake 10 to 12 minutes or until lightly browned then let cool completely.

In the bowl of a food processor, chop up the strawberries, brushing down the sides as needed until they are in smallish pieces but not puréed. Remove them from the bowl. Place the sweetened condensed milk and cream cheese in the bowl (you don't have to clean it out) and process until smooth. By hand, fold in the strawberries.

In the bowl of an electric mixer beat 3/4 cup whipping cream until soft peaks form. Gently fold the whipped cream into strawberry mixture. Spoon the strawberry filling into prepared crust. Cover and freeze 8 to 12 hours or until firm. Beat remaining 1-1/4 cups whipping cream at high speed until foamy and gradually add granulated sugar, beating until soft peaks form. Spread over pie. Freeze 1 hour or until whipped cream is firm. Serves 8.

Jewish London embraces Olympic spirit

Miriam Shaviv
JTA

For Leslie Lyndon and the London Jewish community, it was a minor miracle.

When Lyndon carried the Olympic torch through a north London neighbourhood, it was more than representative of how Jewish Londoners have embraced the Olympic spirit. This was five years since Lyndon, at the age of 63, was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease. No longer able to recall instructions, he needed his stepson, Matthew, to help him through the day.

But like most of the 8,000 torch bearers chosen to carry the Olympic flame in the run-up to the Games, he was being recognized for good works – in his case, as the former cantor of the Masorti New North London Synagogue. And his community came out by the hundreds to support him.

"Never have I felt so confident of an early minyan," said Rabbi Jonathan Wittenberg in an email to his members. "To see you, Leslie, with your typical beaming smile, holding the torch high in both hands, running up the hill – I wonder how many of us cried for joy and love of you and all your family. Then you stopped and lit the torch for the subsequent runner – I'm not sure what the [blessing] ought to be, 'lehadlik ner shel humanity?'" To light the candle of humanity?

This outpouring of pride – replicated across the Jewish suburbs for a couple dozen other Jewish activists also honoured as torch bearers – was typical of how members of London's Jewish community seem to have welcomed the Olympics into their lives. Since the opening ceremony on July 27, Jews have shown enormous involvement both personally and communally.

In the Olympic venues there are, anecdotally, hundreds of Jewish volunteers, from Phil Ravitz, a retired journalist who is responsible for getting archers from their competitions to the press zone, to Anne Iarchy, a personal trainer who is marshalling the road cycling events.

The most visible Jewish presence is the dozen or so Jewish chaplains of all denominations, part of a 190-strong team of religious leaders providing pastoral services to the athletes, media, volunteers and Olympic workers.

"I've been quite busy," said Alex Goldberg, one of the Orthodox chaplains. "You see people who are away from home, others who are recovering from illnesses, who are quite happy to have made it here. Some people can get isolated in big buildings. Others just need to take a break."

While he is there to minister to people of all religions, "I've probably met around 100 Jewish people, mostly from the media," he said. "Even when they are not religious, they are pleased to see a Jewish chaplain on the team. They come up and introduce themselves. I've been here for the past two Shabbatot and a lot of Jewish people came for some coffee and cake after the prayers."

The supply of kosher food to the Olympic Park, however, has been a complicated operation.

David Colman, director at Hermolis, the kosher food supplier, said the company is delivering meals to 25 non-Israeli athletes who wish to keep kosher, as well as a stock of 1,000 meals meant for journalists, 1,000 for volunteers and workers, and 500 for corporate events. In addition, kosher sandwiches and hot meals for visitors are available from some vendors in the Olympic Park.

However, due to Olympic sponsorship rules, shops are not allowed to advertise that they are selling kosher food, and the packaging has had to be minimalist, without the company's normal logos but with a kosher and halal stamp.

"We don't know where our own meals are being sold," Colman said. "It's a bit of a crazy situation. If visitors go to a café and ask for kosher, hopefully they will either be offered it or told where else it is sold."

Across the city, there seems to be a rise in the number of tourists visiting Jewish attractions.

"We certainly have had a more international audience coming through the doors, which is fantastic," said Janice Lopatkin, external relations executive at London's Jewish Museum. "Many people are coming in with Olympic passes, and we have had journalists from Singapore and Hong Kong doing a report about what else to do in London during the Olympics."

The museum has been listed in several Olympic guides to London, and many visitors, she added, may have been attracted to the museum's display about Sir Ludwig Guttmann, a German Jewish refugee to London who inspired and founded the Paralympic Games. In the last month, some 3,000 people have visited a website set up by the Jewish Committee for the London Games (JCLG), which lists the Jewish community's main attractions and facilities, as well as a timetable of Olympic-related events of Jewish interest.

"We have been inundated with hundreds of inquiries through the website, mostly about kosher food in the Olympic Park," said Peter Mason, director of the London Jewish Forum, a partner in the JCLG.

Many congregations have had events to celebrate the opening of the Olympics. Just a few miles from the Olympic Stadium, for example, the Woodford Liberal Synagogue held a special Olympics kiddush last Shabbat. As at several other Liberal shuls, congregants recited a prayer for the Games to be peaceful and healthy, which was written by their rabbi, Richard Jacobi.

The Orthodox chief rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, composed his own prayer in memory of the 11 Israeli athletes murdered at the Munich Olympics 40 years ago.

Other synagogues have had to contend with disruptions caused by the Olympics. Westminster Synagogue, an independent Progressive congregation that is associated with the Reform movement, found that access to its central London building became difficult when Olympic organizers started using Hyde Park across the way to show Olympic events on large screens and hold concerts. As a result, since mid-July the community has been visiting various Reform and Liberal shuls across the city every Shabbat.

"We've been making friends as well as learning how others run their services. We've picked up a few ideas along the way," said Westminister Synagogue's rabbi, Thomas Salamon. "I've been asked to preach in several synagogues and called up to the Torah. It's not unsettling at all. It's a really different experience. Everyone has been very welcoming."

Ahmadinejad makes new call for Israel's annihilation

Asher Zeiger
The Times of Israel

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's most recent call for the destruction of Israel represented his most comprehensively antisemitic speech ever and is particularly "ominous" in light of Tehran's continued quest for nuclear capability, the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) warned last Thursday.

Addressing a group of ambassadors from Islamic countries last week, Ahmadinejad said the "annihilation of the Zionist regime" is not just a Palestinian issue, but the "key for solving the world problems," and he slammed U.S. leaders for "kissing the feet of the Zionists."

Aug. 17th's annual Quds Day – Jerusalem Day – "is not merely a strategic solution for the Palestinian problem, as it is to be viewed as a key for solving the world problems," Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying. "Any freedom lover and justice seeker in the world must do its best for the annihilation of the Zionist regime in order to pave the path for the establishment of justice and freedom in the world."

"It has now been some 400 years that a horrendous Zionist clan has been ruling the major world affairs," added Ahmadinejad, asserting that the Zionists are "behind the scenes of the major power circles, in political, media, monetary and banking organizations in the world."

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The ADL noted in a statement last Thursday that this speech differed from past antisemitic rants by the Iranian leader in that he no longer tried to hide the fact that by "Zionists" he does not mean Israelis, but Jews.

"In his bluntness, Ahmadinejad cuts through the false dichotomy of anti-Zionism and antisemitism when he uses the term 'Zionist' to describe alleged Jewish control of the world for 400 years," said ADL director Abraham Foxman.

Foxman said that while the message itself has been heard before, Ahmadinejad's words had "more ominous overtones and should be taken seriously as the Iranian regime continues on its march toward a nuclear weapon."

Ahmadinejad also made reference to U.S. Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney's visit to Israel last week, saying that the influence of the Zionist regime is so profound that "the presidential election hopefuls must go kiss the feet of the Zionists to ensure their victory in the election... If the people's votes really counts in those countries, why then a candidate must go to kiss the feet of a clandestine Zionist minority, sacrificing the entire prestige, chanted mottoes, and values of their system before the Zionists, and justifying the entire criminal acts of that regime?"

Foxman said that Ahmadinejad's remarks were "filled with antisemitism and expressions of contempt for Israel and its leaders." He called them the "hallmark of the hate-filled and irrational nature of the Iranian regime."

In related news, Iran denied a report that some computers at the country's nuclear facilities were hit with a virus that shut them down and played the AC/DC song Thunderstruck at full blast.

The head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, Fereidoun Abbasi, called the report "incorrect," according to Bloomberg News, citing the Iranian Students News Agency. He did not elaborate on the issue.

Attack on Iran could come soon: ex-Mossad chief

Times of Israel Staff

JERUSALEM — Former Mossad chief Efraim Halevy, who told The Times of Israel in an interview in March that there would be "nothing else left" but a resort to force if the diplomatic track with Iran did not quickly produce a breakthrough, hinted Aug. 2 that the moment of truth on Iran's nuclear drive is imminent.

"If I were an Iranian, I would be very fearful of the next 12 weeks," Halevy, who is also a former national security adviser and ambassador, told the New York Times.

In a recording broadcast on Channel 2 news Aug. 2, he added that Israel's threats of military action had a certain "credibility and seriousness."

The New York Times report, focusing on talks here Aug. 1 by Defence Secretary Leon Panetta, said there was "feverish speculation" in Israel that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "will act in September or early October."

Apart from Netanyahu's concern that Israel's military option would "soon" become redundant, the paper cited several other reasons "for the potential timing."

Among them, it said, was the fact that "Israel does not like to fight wars in winter." Also, Netanyahu "feels that he will have less leverage if [U.S.] President [Barack] Obama is re-elected," while if Mitt Romney were to win the November election, "the new president would be unlikely to want to take on a big military action early in his term."

Still, the Aug. 2 article continued, "a number of administration officials say they remain hopeful that Israel has no imminent plans to attack and may be willing to let the United States take the lead in any future military strike, which they say would not occur until next year at the earliest."

The New York Times further reported that administration officials say "Israeli officials are less confrontational in private" and that Netanyahu "understands the consequences of military action for Israel, the United States and the region. They say they know he has to maintain the credibility of his threat to keep up pressure on the United States to continue with sanctions and the development of military plans."

In his interview with The Times of Israel in late March, Halevy said that if the then-upcoming international talks with Iran on thwarting its nuclear program did not quickly produce a breakthrough, there would be "nothing else left" but a resort to force.

He also said he had "no doubt that for the past few years, Israel has been readying its capabilities to meet the Iranians if necessary by force.

It was "tragic," Halevy added at the time, that "I don't see any great effort being made" by the P5+1 group – the five UN Security Council permanent members and Germany – to prepare urgently and effectively for those talks.

Efraim Halevy

The lights "should be burning through the night" to get a strategy together, he said. "The number one thing the world should be doing [on Iran] is investing enormous preparation into the P5+1 confrontation, because this is really the 'Last Train to San Fernando.'"

Iran, he predicted, would doubtless try to play for time in the talks. The international community, therefore, needed to be ready with its strategy and tactics, and to be represented by "a very high-level, experienced, wise and creative negotiator."

For the international community, said Halevy, "there's no time for, you know, 'Let's meet again in two or three months, let's do our homework, let's not rush things, let's look at it, and so forth.'" Rather, he said, "there has to be a breakthrough… If there is no breakthrough, it means to say that the talks have failed."

Asked if, by a breakthrough, he meant Iran announcing the suspension of its nuclear program, Halevy demurred.

"I don't want to say 'Iran suspending the program.' I don't believe that everything will become public overnight." But it would need to be clear, he said, "that there is a serious negotiation… They don't have to spell it all out, but it has to be clear."

Halevy said he did see signs of greater potential international co-ordination over Iran. He was encouraged by the growing consensus on tackling the civil war in Syria, notably including Russia and China, which he said could also be reflected in a co-ordinated strategy on Iran. He also noted that the priority for the ayatollahs' regime in Iran is "survival" at all costs.

Nonetheless, if talks fail, "there's nothing else left" but a resort to force, he said.

Perhaps, it was put to Halevy, Israel could live with a nuclear weapons-capable Iran? He responded: "I don't think that we should countenance that as long as we can do what we can to remove it. I don't accept the notion that Israel is destructible. But I think that if Iran retains a nuclear capability, life here is going to be very tough for a very long period to come. Israel will not disappear, but Israel will go through a period which I would not like it to go through."

Asked whether he believed the Israeli government wanted a diplomatic solution, he answered: "I'm not sure every Israeli wants a diplomatic solution… I'm not sure that the government is entirely behind this support for a diplomatic solution."

In related news, a former head of the Israel Defence Forces military intelligence said that his country lacks the international "legitimacy" needed to succeed in an attack on Iran's nuclear installations.

The timing for an Israeli strike "is not now since, even if is successful, it will ruin the legitimacy that is needed," Aharon Ze'evi Frakash told the Jerusalem Post.

Farkash served as the IDF's head of military intelligence from 2001-2006.

"If Israel attacks, we will find ourselves being asked why we attacked when the world was imposing tough economic sanctions and was paying for this and was hurting as a result," Farkash said.

He reportedly added that an Israeli attack would turn into an "operation with more attacks within weeks, months and years after" the initial strike. "This means that Israel will need legitimacy to be able to maintain" the operation. This was "the key to success or failure."

He also said Israel is unlikely to attack Iran before the U.S. presidential election on Nov. 6. What is needed, he said, is to make the Islamic regime feel as if it is facing an "existential threat."

Sanctions not working

However forceful our statements, they have not convinced Iran that we are serious about stopping them. Right now, the Iranian regime believes that the international community does not have the will to stop its nuclear program. This must change and it must change quickly, because time to resolve this issue peacefully is running out."

Panetta emphasized the U.S. administration's resolve to prevent Tehran from developing a nuclear weapon.

"I want to reassert again the position of the United States, that with regards to Iran, we will not allow Iran to develop a nuclear weapon, period. We will not allow them to develop a nuclear weapon, and we will exert all options in the effort to ensure that that does not happen. I want you and the people of Israel to know a few things that have not and will not change. The United States stands firmly with Israel, and we have a rock-solid commitment to the security of Israel and to the security of its citizens. And make no mistake: we will remain determined to prevent Iran from ever acquiring a nuclear weapon."

White House officials agreed with Netanyahu's assessment that sanctions have not set back Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program, but they counselled patience.

"We completely agree with the prime minister's assessment that Iran has failed to make that choice and that is absolutely a disappointment," White House spokesperson Jay Carney said Aug. 1.

During a meeting earlier last week with Mitt Romney, the presumed U.S. Republican presidential nominee, Netanyahu expressed skepticism about the sanctions.

"We have to be honest and say that all the diplomacy and sanctions so far have not set back the Iranian program by one iota," he told Romney.

The Obama administration has been making the case for months to Netanyahu that he should delay any plans to strike Iran until it exhausts peaceful options.

Asked about Netanyahu's comments, Ben Rhodes, the U.S. deputy national security adviser, also agreed with the Israeli leader.

"We continue to be dissatisfied, as Prime Minister Netanyahu is, with Iran's continued failure to live up to its international obligations," he said.

Rhodes said, however, that the sanctions were having a dire impact on Iran's economy and suggested more time was needed to assess whether they would move Iran's leadership to agree to terms for greater transparency about its nuclear activities.

"What we see today is not just a unified international community, but you see sharp divisions within the Iranian political system, far more so than we have seen in many years," Rhodes continued. "And I think that is a testament to the pressure that they're under."

Rhodes said that what the Obama administration has accomplished "is a steady ratcheting up the pressure that is increasing the cost for the Iranians in failing to make the right decisions. And until they do shift course, we will continue to look for ways to increase the impact."

State Dep't report describes 'rising tide' of antisemitism

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department's report on religious freedom described a "global increase" in antisemitism and said the "rising tide of antisemitism" was among the key trends of last year.

The executive summary of the report for 2011, released on July 30, also detailed the "impact of political and demographic transitions on religious minorities" and "the effects of conflict on religious freedom."

The increased antisemitism was "manifested in Holocaust denial, glorification, and relativism; conflating opposition to certain policies of Israel with blatant antisemitism; growing nationalistic movements that target 'the other'; and traditional forms of antisemitism, such as conspiracy theories, acts of desecration and assault, 'blood libel' and cartoons demonizing Jews," the summary said.

It was not clear from the report how its authors assessed an "increase" in antisemitism. There was no overall quantification of the phenomenon, and individual country reports, while listing instances of official and societal antisemitism, did not compare rates to previous years' reports.

The emphasis on antisemitism reflects a policy initiated by Hannah Rosenthal, the current special envoy on antisemitism. Rosenthal has pressed for the incorporation of antisemitism monitoring into the department's overall human rights reports, arguing that it increases awareness of the issue among U.S. diplomats.

The George W. Bush administration, which expanded monitoring of antisemitism by creating the post of an envoy to combat antisemitism, kept its reports on the issue separate.

Countries singled out for special notice on antisemitism included:

- Venezuela, where President Hugo Chavez described Israel's treatment of the Palestinians as "genocide" and called Zionism racism, and an op-ed in a government-owned newspaper that described Norwegian mass killer Anders Breivik as a "sabbath goy."
- Ukraine, where there were several instances of vandalism targeting Jewish buildings and cemeteries, as well as incitement by ultranationalist figures.
- Hungary, where the rise of an antisemitic political party was noted.
- Egypt, where antisemitic cartoons and articles persisted in government-run and opposition media after the revolution in early 2011 that ousted the regime of Hosni Mubarak.
- Iran, where the report said that the "government's antisemitic rhetoric, along with a perception among radical Muslims that all Jewish citizens of the country supported Zionism and the State of Israel, continued to create a hostile atmosphere for Jews." The report also said that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "continued to question regularly the existence and the scope of the Holocaust and publicly called for the destruction of Israel, which created a more hostile environment for the Jewish community."
- The Palestinian areas, where the report noted an instance of a Hamas imam in the Gaza Strip calling for the death of Jews, as well as a documentary on Palestinian Authority TV that characterized Jewish rites as "sin and filth."

President Hugo Chavez

The country report on Israel said that "government policy contributed to the generally free practice of religion, although government discrimination against non-Jews and non-Orthodox streams of Judaism continued." It noted that Christian missionaries were turned away at the airport in some instances and also noted the Interior Ministry's refusal to recognize some U.S. converts to Judaism as Jews.

"A minority of Jews in the country observes the Orthodox tradition, and the majority of Jewish citizens objected to exclusive Orthodox control over fundamental aspects of their personal lives," the report said.

It noted the practice on some public buses of segregating men from women.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry had yet to formulate a response to the report, an official at the Israeli Embassy in Washington said last week.

Recording instances of societal discrimination, the report listed organized efforts to persuade Jewish businesses not to hire Arabs, as well as attacks by extremist settlers on mosques.

It also noted extremist Muslim riots, including several instances in which rioters at the mosques overlooking the Western Wall stoned Jewish worshippers.

Israel, PA reach deal on taxes and goods transfers

Asher Zeiger
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Several months of secret meetings between Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad resulted in an agreement reached on July 31 that Steinitz hailed as "an important step in strengthening the economic ties between Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

A Finance Ministry press release said the agreement will help foster trade between Israel and the PA, as well as to help strengthen the Palestinian tax system and strengthen its financial base. Additionally, the deal will enable both sides to more effectively fight smuggling and tax evasion.

The new arrangements will go into effect Jan. 1 and will be monitored by a joint team of Israeli and Palestinian experts, the statement said.

"The new arrangements are part of our overall stated policy to support the Palestinian society and to strengthen their economy," said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He added that the agreement will "hopefully further our relations with the Palestinians in other areas as well."

Fayyad said that the agreements "will help to strengthen the economic base of the Palestinian Authority... [and] also improve the economic relations between the Palestinian Authority and Israel." TimesofIsrael.com

Israel Briefs

Hamas condemns visit

Gaza's ruling Hamas party has criticized a Palestinian official for visiting a memorial at the Nazi death camp Auschwitz and paying respects to its 1.5 million victims there, most of them Jews. Hamas official Fawzi Barhoum, expressing the Islamic militant group's position, claimed Aug. 1 that the Holocaust "is a big lie." He said last week's visit to the Auschwitz by Ziad al-Bandak, an adviser to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, went against Palestinian public opinion. Abbas and Hamas are political rivals. Al-Bandak, a Christian, came on an invitation from a private Polish foundation promoting tolerance. In 2007, the Palestinian and the Israeli ambassadors to Poland made a joint visit to the memorial.

Barak orders conscription

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak last week ordered the Israeli Defence Forces to draft haredi men as it does other Jewish Israelis. Barak has allowed a month for officials to formulate regulations on haredi conscription, according to reports. The order came as the Tal Law, which allowed haredi men to defer army service, expired Aug. 1. Israel's Supreme Court overturned the law in February. Israeli law mandates that Jewish Israelis enter the army at age 18. Some Israelis legally defer army service for a year or more to study and prepare for the army. Israeli Arabs are not required to serve in the army.

Bombing recalled

A memorial service at Hebrew University in Jerusalem marked the 10th anniversary of a fatal bombing there that killed nine people. "A decade has passed since the attack, and it's not only a time to mourn, but also a time to reflect upon the mission entrusted to us," Hebrew U president Menahem Ben-Sasson said at the July 31 memorial service. "We are entrusted with the development of knowledge that knows no shade of skin or religion. And so we say to the families, we shall endure."

Morsi denies letter to Peres

Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi has denied sending a friendly letter to Israeli President Shimon Peres. A Morsi spokesman said the Egyptian leader didn't send the letter, which according to the Times of Israel said that Morsi hopes for continued security and stability in the region, including for Israel. "President Morsi did not send any correspondence to the Israeli president, and the reports to that effect in Israeli newspapers today are fabricated," the spokesman told the Egyptian newspaper Al-Ahram July 31. "These fabrications do not stop." Peres' office had no comment, but his office publicized a copy of the letter that speaks to its authenticity, with a heading from the Egyptian Embassy in Israel. In July, Peres sent a letter to Morsi expressing hope for continued peaceful relations between their countries. Since becoming president in June, Morsi hasn't verbally attacked Israel directly and has expressed a willingness to stay faithful to the countries' peace treaty, the Times reported.

Israel defence industry lowers profile at air show

Anshel Pfeffer
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

FARNBOROUGH, England — The Israeli defence industry and its flagship company, Israel Aerospace Industries, have produced some fabled combat aircraft, battle tanks and guided missile boats, as well as thousands of electronic warfare gadgets over the years.

Imagine, then, the surprise of visitors at the Farnborough International Air Show west of London recently, when IAI's display at the show was dedicated to a tractor with the unlikely name of TaxiBot.

Of course, this is not just any tractor, but an advanced semi-robotic system designed to tow jet airliners of all sizes from the terminal building to the runway, thus saving thousands of tons of jet-fuel and minimizing noise pollution around airports. Still, it is an intriguing choice for the largest defence company in Israel to put in its display window.

"Our innovation unit came up with the idea by adapting unique capabilities developed in the military to the civilian market," Ron Braier, the TaxiBot program director said. "We solved a problem that other companies had been looking to solve."

The system, which is about to undergo operational tests with German airline Lufthansa at its main hub in Frankfurt, is partly based on robotics developed for the Guardium, an unmanned land vehicle that patrols Israel's southern borders.

"Airliners spend an average of 18 minutes using their engines before they actually take off, often much longer," said Moshe Ararat, head of business development for IAI's Lahav division. "For a Boeing 747, that means using up a ton of jet-fuel that could be used in flight. What we have developed is a system that can transport the plane to the runway without starting its engines. It saves fuel, reduces noise and protects the engines from ingesting foreign objects on the taxiways."

To untrained eyes, the TaxiBot looks like any other tractor that pushes airliners away from the terminal building. But the robotic arm that grips the plane's front undercarriage causes no structural fatigue and is operated by the pilot in the cockpit.

IAI hopes to enter a whole new market of civilian airport management where they've had no presence until now.

It's a new direction for the corporation, though still part of its overall strategy to shift at least part of its export business (82 per cent of IAI's revenues) to the civilian field, which currently accounts for only about a third of the company's operations.

The focus on new, advanced, civilian products is also the result of obstacles facing Israeli corporations in a marketplace where some of the biggest customers are countries that do not have diplomatic relations with Israel, particularly the Arab Gulf states. That doesn't mean IAI's top executives, chair Dov Baharav and CEO Yossi Weiss, who started the job only two weeks ago, don't discuss military deals at the show, but those conversations are pushed to the background.

The special sensitivities of marketing Israeli weapons systems are easily discernible at Farnborough. There are two striking examples. One is the display of the Eurofighter Typhoon, the main combat jet of the British, German, Italian and Spanish air forces. Surrounding the plane, which proudly displays the flags of its customers, including Saudi Arabia, a wide array of missiles is spread out to demonstrate its multiple capabilities. Among them is a tube simply identified as a "targeting pod."

What isn't mentioned is that the pod, which allows the Eurofighter to attack from a great distance by day or night, is the Litening, designed in Israel by Rafael Systems.

Another example is that of French electronics giant Thales, presenting the Watchkeeper 450, an advanced unmanned airborne surveillance system ordered by the British army, soon to be in service over Afghanistan. There is a full-sized version of the drone and its control cabin on display, but no mention that this is actually the Israeli Hermes 450 designed by Elbit Systems.

Both companies, Elbit and Rafael have their own displays and booths for meetings at Farnborough, but they are content to downplay their involvement in some of the most successful products in the defence marketplace.

"We seek co-operation with defence companies in other countries exactly for this reason," said one of the executives. "Not everyone is comfortable buying Israeli weapons. This way we can continue to develop and manufacture, safeguarding Israel's technological advantage while providing work for thousands of employees and still making profits."

Team to compete in Solar Decathlon China

JNS.org

TEL AVIV — An Israeli team will submit an entry to the prestigious Solar Decathlon China competition scheduled for August 2013. The competition will include academic teams from 20 countries who will compete for the title of champion of ecological construction.

The Israeli team, including members from Tel Aviv University, Shenkar College of Engineering and Design, Neri Bloomfield School of Design and Education, and the College of Management Academic Studies, will present an innovative ecological ("green") house that will generate more electricity than it needs for it to function.

The team has been preparing for the competition since last year, when Dr. Yossi Kuri of the Department for Interior Design, Structure and Environment at Shenkar College, in co-operation with architect Chen Shalita, announced his intention to gather a team of students to compete in the upcoming event.

According to the U.S. Department of Energy Solar Decathlon web page, Solar Decathlon China is the most recent addition to the international family of Solar Decathlon competitions.

The Solar Decathlon is an award-winning program that challenges collegiate teams to design, build and operate solar-powered houses that are cost-effective, energy-efficient and attractive. The winner of the competition is the team that best blends affordability, consumer appeal and design excellence with optimal energy production and maximum efficiency.

A dark, cynical look at life in the army

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Stories about soldiers generally tend to be either farcical MASH-style parodies or dark, serious "war is hell" types.

Budding Israeli writer Shani Boianjiu's disjointed debut novel about three Israeli female soldiers, The People of Forever Are Not Afraid (Hogarth), out next month, definitely leans toward the latter.

At the start of the book, Yael, Avishag and Lea are three friends graduating high school and anxious about their upcoming compulsory stint in the Israel Defence Forces.

They attend school in a "caravan of a classroom" in a tiny village of 82 homes on the border with Lebanon built to "Jewdify" the Galilee in 1983.

The girls hate the village where cellphone reception is almost non-existent, where missiles fall from the sky as they have done "since always," and where most people's fates are tied to the "company that makes parts that go into machines that help make machines that make airplanes."

Shani Boianjiu during her stint in the army

Yael has a crush on Avishag's brother, Dan, who dies while playing Russian roulette – the first of several men who die premature and violent deaths in this book. (Not to accuse the author of misandry, but the male characters in this book tend to be shallow, easily-discarded sex toys for the women. One horrific segment in the end, especially, sheds a rather bad light on male Israeli soldiers.)

After boot camp, Yael is assigned to a border post near Hebron, where young Arab children steal everything, including the fence that surrounds the camp.

Avishag joins the only combat infantry unit for women and is assigned to the Sinai, where she spends her days flirting and watching refugees sneak across the Egyptian border on her computer screen.

Lea works at a Hebron checkpoint, monitoring Palestinian day workers crossing into Israel. She belongs to the blue-bereted military police, which she hates, and is the least satisfying of all possible assignments. "It was a unit designed for stupid, poor people."

Army life is seen mostly as a waste of time. "A numbing respite from the breathless race" of normal life, Lea thinks.

To pass the time, they sleep with their male colleagues, play pranks on one another or on civilians (one of the girls blindfolds an Arab man and pretends to shoot him), daydream and sunbathe on the hot sand while injecting themselves with frozen IV to keep cool.

Despite this being mostly a dark novel, it's not without its share of wit and parody. In one chapter, Avishag lies naked on one of the watchtowers on the Israeli-Egyptian border, while on the other side an Egyptian soldier is caught with his pants down, using only his left hand to watch her through binoculars.

This becomes a diplomatic incident once the world press gets a hold of the story.

Boianjiu, who was born in 1987 in Kfar Vradim, a small town similar to the one the girls in this book live in, has been published in several magazines. At 25, she is the youngest recipient of the National Book Foundation's 5 Under 35 Award.

She is undoubtedly a talented writer but on this, her first novel, her unstructured writing is in need of some direction.

There are several moments of brilliance, such as the aforementioned Diplomatic Incident chapter, or the tongue-in-cheek Means of Suppressing Demonstrations, in which a small group of protesting Palestinians demands that Lea's unit shoots them with real bullets in order to attract the attention of the press. [This chapter was published as a short story in The New Yorker and inspired the magazine to launch a parody-writing contest]

Possibly the best chapter is the deeply moving People That Don't Exist. In it, Avishag, who has just taken a pill to abort the fetus inside her, watches on her computer screen as Egyptian border soldiers shoot a Sudanese man as he leaps over the border fence. As the fetus inside her slowly dies, she raises her hand and touches the wounded man on the green monitor in front of her. "It is cold and far and real. I pretend to touch the child I'll never meet, I pretend I don't exist. For that while only, it gets to be only her."

Meanwhile, in a shifting point of view, we see what the Sudanese man is thinking as he lies on the ground, feeling the contact that Avishag is making with him on her screen. "I could swear someone was touching me. Someone's hand, I couldn't see it, but I could still feel it on my shoulder…"

Powerful, touching stuff.

But this ever-changing point of view is also the biggest problem with this book. The point of view switches from one chapter to the next between that of each of the three girls. Because they all speak with that same detached, cynical, youthful voice, it makes it hard to distinguish which narrator is speaking. This gets annoying really quickly.

The women return home from their stint in the army noticeably scarred. One takes antidepressants, one travels the world and another keeps an Arab man bound to a chair in the smaller bedroom of her "one-and-a-half" in Tel Aviv. War is not good for children, Boianjiu seems to be saying.

The plot of The People of Forever Are Not Afraid is disjointed, a series of vignettes that could each possibly be published separately as short stories. (Her first published story, The Sound of All Girls Screaming, in Vice magazine, is also a chapter from the novel).

But as a narrative whole it lacks cohesion. Several of the chapters include long-winded digressive flashbacks that might work fine in shorter fiction but as a novel slow the pace down. In fact, perhaps, it might have been better if it was published as a collection of thematically linked short stories.

Despite these problems, there's a lot of promise in Boianjiu's debut novel. The author's stream-of-consciousness, conversational prose can make the dark and sombre scenes witty and ironic.

Boianjiu is an exciting, youthful writer, not afraid to take on heavy themes, and there's no doubt we'll be hearing from her again. A Hebrew version of The People of Forever Are Not Afraid is slated to be published in Israel later next year.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

JON VOIGHT FEATURED AT LAUNCH OF UJA 2013 CAMPAIGN

Academy Award-winning actor Jon Voight is coming to town to help with the launch of the United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's Campaign 2013.

Voight's performances in the films Midnight Cowboy (1969), Deliverance (1972) and Coming Home (1978) make him an integral part of postwar American cinema. His outspoken support of Israel should also make him a hero to those who love the one democratic nation in the Middle East.

Three years ago, when some 50 movie celebrities – including Voight's Coming Home co-star Jane Fonda – signed a petition protesting the Toronto International Film Festival's inaugural "City To City" spotlight on Tel Aviv, Voight issued a public letter in protest. Fonda and the others accused TIFF of facilitating a propaganda campaign for the Israeli government while ignoring the suffering of the Palestinian people, specifically in Gaza.

"Jane Fonda's whole idea of the 'poor Palestinians' and 'look how many Palestinians the Israelis killed in Gaza,' is misconstrued," Voigt wrote. "Does she not remember what actually took place in Gaza? Did Israel not give the Palestinians of Gaza the hope that there could be peace? In response, did Hamas not launch rockets from Gaza into Israel, killing many innocent people?

"I was in Israel. I saw the rockets coming down on Sderot and visited many families who lost their loved ones. How long can a democratic country keep from defending itself? Time and again, [Israel] offered the Palestinians land. They always refused. They don't want a piece of the pie, they want the whole pie. They will not be happy until they see Israel in the sea."

The UJA 2013 Campaign Launch also features 21-year-old singer Hagit Yasso from Sderot, the winner of Kochav Nolad, Israel's version of TV's American Idol. Fairmont Royal York Hotel, Tuesday Aug. 21, 7:30 p.m. Includes kosher dessert reception. 416-631-5705.

Jewish Television Show: The Canadian Jewish Edition with host Gloria Valentine is a show on Rogers Cable 10 that features interviews with Jewish personalities such as Nat Garnick (Aug. 9), Elly Gotz (Aug. 19, 22, 23) and mezzo-soprano Renee Barda (Sept. 2, 4, 6). Viewing times are Sundays at 8 a.m., Wednesdays at 3 a.m. and Thursdays at 6:30 p.m. Gerda Frieberg and Adam Furstenberg are among the guests scheduled for the fall.

Names in the News: Actor Jesse Eisenberg, whose film credits include The Social Network and To Rome With Love, has written The Revisionist, a Holocaust-themed play that is scheduled to open at an off-Broadway theatre in 2013, according to the Times of Israel.

The play focuses on a science-fiction writer who meets with a relative in Poland, a Holocaust survivor who has a secret. Eisenberg has not indicated whether he will appear in the play. He appeared in his play Asuncion, which also ran off-Broadway last year.

Names in the News II: The Nutty Professor, a new stage production based on Jerry Lewis's 1963 film of the same name, opened recently in Nashville, Tenn., before an anticipated run in New York. A musical, the production features a score by Marvin Hamlisch and is being directed by Lewis himself, who is 86 years old. The idea came from actor Michael Andrew, who plays the title role, a Jekyll-Hyde character who is both the nebbishy Julius Kelp and his assured alter ego, Buddy Love.

Andrew told the New York Times, he first came to Lewis with the idea for the play about eight years ago. "I said, 'Look, we're really just looking for your blessing to do this.'" Andrew reportedly said to Lewis – who replied: "Blessing? I'm going to direct it, and you're going to play those two characters."

Novelist focuses on Arab-Israeli conflict

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The theme of sectarian violence often takes centre stage in Sharon McKay's novels, and Enemy Territory, her latest one, faithfully conforms to this pattern.

"I have been writing about conflict for a young adult audience for years," said McKay, referring to such previous books as Charlie Wilcox, Thunder over Kandahar and War Brothers.

Enemy Territory, set in contemporary Israel and the West Bank, is about two young teenagers, Sam, an Israeli Jew, and Yusuf, a Palestinian Arab, who find themselves sharing a room in Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem after they are both badly injured.

Predictably enough, they are initially hostile to each other, but after deciding to run away from the hospital to embark on a midnight adventure in the Old City, they learn to respect their cultural and political differences and form a friendship.

"I wrote Enemy Territory because it was a huge challenge," explained McKay, who was born in Montreal and now lives in Prince Edward Island. "I felt that everything written to date on the Arab-Israeli conflict presented one point of view or the other. I wanted to write a book that showed how young people perceive the conflict, and how it is possible for them to begin talking and understanding one another."

Like some of her books, Enemy Territory, published by Annick Press in Toronto, is largely based on personal observation.

A stickler for details, McKay went to the Middle East to gather material, living with an Israeli in western Jerusalem and with a Palestinian in the West Bank as she methodically conducted research.

The Arab-Israeli dispute was not McKay's first exposure to strife.

"I spent every summer from the age of 12 with my grandmother in Belfast, Northern Ireland, living between the Protestants of Shankill Road and the Catholics of Falls Road," she said.

One of the first bombs to explode during the so-called "The Troubles" in Ireland, she recalled, went off near her aunt's garden wall, flinging her and her grandmother out of bed.

Not surprisingly, McKay detects similarities between the Irish problem and the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"They come up in the point of view of children and teenagers," she said. "It's amazing how fast all kids can adjust to bombs and guns and security checks. Equally amazing is how children can accept adults' explanations of conflicts without question."

Nonetheless, Northern Ireland and Israel are different in some important respects, she added. "Northern Ireland is not surrounded by enemies on all sides. Nor did anyone ever suggest that we [the Irish], would be blown off the face of the earth."

Sharon McKay

Before writing Enemy Territory, McKay produced Charlie Wilcox, a blend of fact and fiction turning on the experiences of her great uncle, a Newfoundlander, as an under-age soldier in World War I.

A trip to Afghanistan in 2009, under the auspices of the Canadian Forces War Artists Program, prompted McKay to write Thunder over Kandahar.

She wrote War Brothers, the story of African child soldiers, after talking to them in Uganda.

In addition, she has written on the Holocaust in The Whisperers Trilogy (with Kathy Kacer) and on Esther Brandeau, the first known Jewish person to live in New France, in Esther.

McKay believes that every Canadian, regardless of religion, has some kind of relationship with Israel, however tentative.

"It can be positive, negative, filled with love or animosity, but everyone has an opinion," said McKay, who cried after reading Exodus as a teen.

"Israel became a country of my dreams and imagination," she said. "To me, Israel is the gatekeeper of the civilized world as I know it. The West Bank was equally beguiling."

Although Israel's negotiations with the Palestinian Authority have broken down, she doubts whether the situation is hopeless.

"I have faith that the youth of Palestine and Israel will talk to each other using social media. And while the adults will cry, 'They want to kill us/take our land,' my hope is that kids will begin with 'hello.' It may be naive, but what is the alternative?

"No one ever imagined that there could be peace in Northern Ireland. My hope is that the day will come soon when the Middle East, too, will become a peaceful haven."

Barry Manilow joins Songbook Hall of Fame

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

When Barry Manilow decided to make music his career, his goal was to create music that would endure beyond his lifetime.

That goal was reached as Manilow was formally enshrined into the Great American Songbook Hall Of Fame this past June. Manilow's music is now deemed on a par with fellow Great American Songbook composers such as Irving Berlin, George Gershwin and Cole Porter.

It is an honour that Manilow does not take lightly as he prepares for his upcoming concerts on Aug. 20 and 21 at Casino Rama.

"What I love most about the Great American Songbook composers is the respect they all gave to the lyrics in a song. Today, the stars in music are not the songwriters or singers, but the engineers and producers who give a groove and a good rhythm in songs. I miss the art of songwriting and it's sad. So, I am deeply appreciated of being inducted into the Great American Songbook Hall Of Fame and to be respected in music," said Manilow, 69, in a phone interview.

Barry Manilow

"Barry cares about the classic way of writing a song, telling a story with emotion with a melody to go with poignant lyrics. The Manilow songs continue the tradition of the great songwriters of the 20th century," said singer-songwriter Michael Feinstein, who inducted Manilow into the hall of fame and was an archivist for Ira Gershwin.

The Manilow song catalogue featuring 25 top 40 songs, such as Copacabana, Even Now and Mandy, are standard fare in many pops orchestral shows, and a number of Manilow tribute shows have been presented in Canada, England and the United States.

"The many tribute shows indicate the acceptance of Barry Manilow as a standard bearer of the classic song," said Alan Jacobson, who produced I Am Music: The Songs Of Barry Manilow, which featured 10 vocalists performing Manilow's hits at the Plaza Theatre in Palm Beach, Fla., last May.

"Barry's music has melodies that stick in your head. His music is timeless, and the Manilow songs will endure for many generations to come," Jacobson added.

"My fans really love those big hit songs, so I will go from It's a Miracle to I Write the Songs and also throw in album cuts such as 15 Minutes at both Casino Rama shows. My hits never get old for me, and I always go back to basics – find the meaning of the song in the lyric and sing believing in the words," Manilow said.

Manilow was raised by his mother, Edna, and grandparents, Esther and Joseph Manilow, Jewish immigrants from Russia, in a small Brooklyn apartment. Although born as Barry Pincus, he changed his surname to Manilow shortly before his bar mitzvah out of love for his zayde.

Manilow honed his music first on accordion and refined it on the piano that he received as a bar mitzvah gift.

For a time, things were traumatic for Manilow financially and emotionally. He nearly went bankrupt twice and had married and divorced his high school sweetheart by the age of 25.

In the 1960s, Manilow coached singers who wanted to audition on Broadway and wrote commercial jingles, before becoming musical director for Bette Midler. Manilow produced Midler's first album, among many more for several singers before starring on his own in 1973.

Very little has gone wrong in Manilow's career. In addition to selling 80 million albums over his career, Manilow showed his theatrical flair by co-writing a musical based on his hit song Copacabana, which also became a made-for-television movie, and recorded concept albums on jazz, Broadway standards, big band and swing music.

Barry Manilow stars in concert at Casino Rama, Aug. 20 and 21 at 8 p.m. For tickets, call 1-800-832-7529 or go to www.casinorama.ca.

U.S. gymnast Aly Raisman's star rises

JTA

LONDON — While both took to the podiums in London last week to receive a medal, 18-year-old Alexandra (Aly) Raisman's Olympic star was rising as 36-year-old swimmer Jason Lezak's appeared to be setting.

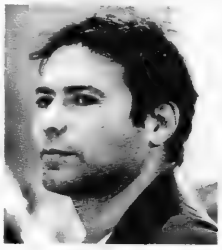
Raisman, of Needham, Mass., helped Team USA take the women's team gold on July 31 – the first Olympic gold medal for the U.S. gymnastics squad since the 1996 Games in Atlanta.

Though Raisman was favoured to win a medal in the all-around individual competition, she finished fourth and out of the medals.

With the events concluded, she finished with 59.666 points, the same as Russian gymnast Aliya Mustafina. Under the tie-breaking system employed at the Games, each athlete's worst score from four events is eliminated and the remaining results tallied up. Under that formula, Mustafina captured the bronze medal.

Still, Raisman could add to her medal total in individual floor exercises and in the balance beam finals, events that were held after The CJN went to press.

Lezak, a four-time gold medallist likely competing in his last Olympics, helped the American men's swimming team qualify for the 4x100-metre freestyle swimming finals. The team went on to finish second, receiving a silver medal – Lezak's eighth medal overall in four Olympics. Lezak did not compete in the finals.



Israeli judoka Arik Ze'evi

Meanwhile, the Israeli delegation was experiencing its ups and downs early in the Games.

On July 31, two Israeli medal hopefuls were faring well in windsurfing.

In women's RS:X-class sailing, Israeli Lee-El Korzits was third overall after six races in the 10-race competition. Korzits finished first in one race, second in two, had one third-place finish, a seventh and an 11th.

In men's RS:X, Israeli medal hopeful Shahar Zubari was in 12th place after six races. Zubari, who won a bronze medal in the event in Beijing Games, was a long shot to reach the top 10 and earn a spot in the medal round.

Yakov Toumarkin, a Russian-born Israeli swimmer, advanced to the finals of the 200-metre backstroke, but finished seventh.

In judo, medal hopeful Arik Ze'evi lost his first match in 43 seconds. A four-time European champion, Ze'evi was competing in his fourth – and likely final – Olympics. He had won a bronze medal at the 2004 Games in Athens, but was quickly beaten by German judoka Dimitri Peters in the men's 100-kilogram match.

Judoka Alice Schlesinger was eliminated from competition early last week.

Political differences between Israel and its Arab neighbours came to London when the Lebanese judo team refused to practise next to the Israeli team. The Lebanese even erected a makeshift barrier to split their gym into two halves, according to the Times of Israel.

Even before the start of the Games, Iranian judo athlete Javad Mahjoob withdrew from the competition, citing "critical digestive system infection." That led to widespread speculation that Iran was maintaining a longstanding policy of not allowing its athletes to compete against Israelis.

In the pool, American swimmers led all the way in the men's 4x100-metre relay until Yannick Agnel of France pulled ahead of Ryan Lochte in the final lap. France finished first in three minutes 9.93 seconds, ahead of the United States (3:10.38) and Russia (3:11.41).

Lezak, though he did not swim in the relay final, had helped his teammates Lochte and Phelps qualify in the morning preliminaries.

"The coaches had a tough decision to make with so many talented 100 freestylers and then the two best all-around swimmers in the world," Lezak told FoxSports.com via email. "Of course, I would have liked to be a part of the final. If you asked any of us who swam prelims, they would have answered it the same."

While he has not specifically said he would return for another Summer Games, Lezak, who was inducted into the National Jewish Hall of Fame in 2010, is the oldest member of the U.S. men's swim team.

"As the body gets older, sometimes the mind wants to go hard for a lot longer. But I've learned over the course of the last several years how many laps is enough, how many is too much," he told the Los Angeles Times.

Since his historic comeback at the Beijing Olympics, Lezak has participated in Israel's Maccabiah Games, winning four gold medals, and taught swimming clinics for neighbourhood kids at the Merage Jewish Community Center of Orange County in Southern California. He has two children and is an active member of Temple Isaiah in Newport Beach, Calif.

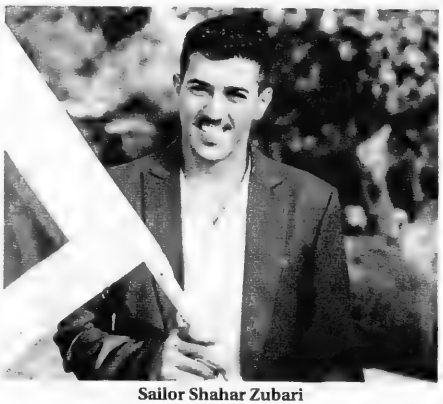
"It's something for me to get in touch more with Jewish kids and hopefully inspire them," he said in 2009. "I really didn't have anyone like that growing up."

Raisman scored 15.300 in the floor exercise to win the event, performing her routine to a string-heavy version of Hava Nagila. Raisman also had performed to Hava Nagila when she gained a berth on the U.S. team last year.

She is trained by Mihai and Sylvia Brestyan, the Romanian couple who coached the Israeli national team in the early 1990s. The coaches and her mother selected Hava Nagila after several exhaustive late-night online searches, they told JTA last year.

She is proud to be using the Jewish song "because there aren't too many Jewish elites out there," Raisman said last year. And, she added, "I like how the crowd can clap to it."

A clip from NBC showing Raisman's parents' reaction to her uneven bar routine garnered more than 25,000 hits on YouTube.



Sailor Shahar Zubari

The clip shows Raisman's mother, and father commenting on their daughter's routine from the stands. Her mother, Lynn, says, "Let's go, let's go," and "Come on, come on" while shifting in her seat, and her father, Rick, remains silent until yelling "Stick it, please, stick it!" at the end of Raisman's routine.

Raisman is a recipient of the Pearl D. Mazor Outstanding Female Jewish High School Scholar-Athlete of the Year Award given out by the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in New York.

Other notable performances of Jewish athletes included U.S. fencer Timothy Morhouse, who lost to Italy's Diego Occhiuzzi in the quarterfinals.

In tennis, Israel's Shahar Peer was eliminated by Russia's Maria Sharapova, one of the top-ranked players in the world.

The Israeli Olympic tennis duo of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram were eliminated after losing in two sets to the American Bryan brothers, Mike and Bob. Earlier, Ram and Erlich upset the 2008 gold medallists in men's doubles, Roger Federer and Stanislaw Wawrinca of Switzerland.

The Israelis beat the Swiss pair, 1-6, 7-5, 6-3, in the second round to advance to the quarterfinals.

Along with Israel, the Erlich-Ram victory brought grins to Jewish communities in Argentina and neighbouring Uruguay. Erlich was born in Buenos Aires and made aliyah with his family when he was a year old. Ram is a native of Montevideo, Uruguay. His father is the Israeli Betar Jerusalem soccer player Amiram Ram; his mother is Uruguayan.

Erlich and Ram have been representing Israel for more than a decade. Their greatest victory came in 2008, when they won the Australian Open. They also own Davis Cup wins in 2009 over Russia, in 2007 over Luxembourg and Italy, and in 2006 over Great Britain.

In men's gymnastics, Israel's Alex Shatilov qualified for the finals of the floor exercise after finishing fourth overall. That event took place after The CJN went to press. He also finished 12th in the men's individual all-around competition.

In men's rowing, David Banks of the U.S. men's eight team finished out of the medals in fourth, in an event that saw Canada win silver.

BINSTOCK ELIMINATED

Beach volleyball player Josh Binstock and partner Martin Reader saw their Olympic dreams come to an end when they were eliminated from further competition by Italy in the "lucky loser" event.

Binstock and Reader finished third in their group and had to win the lucky loser to continue their quest for a medal. They fell to the Italians 2-0.

In earlier round robin competition, Binstock and Reader defeated Britain in their opening match, two sets to nil, but then lost to Norway and Brazil by the same 2-0 score.

Israel wary of changes in Egypt, IDC Herzliya VP says

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The fact that Egypt is now led by a member of the Muslim Brotherhood is cause for concern and has prompted Israel to increase its security along its southern border, Jonathan Davis says.

Newly elected President Mohammed Morsi has domestic concerns that will hopefully prevent him from dragging Egypt into conflict with Israel, Davis, vice-president for external relations and head of the Raphael Recanati International School at the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC) Herzliya, said during a recent trip to Toronto.

"[Morsi] needs to meet the needs of his country and feed his people. But at the end of the day, the Muslim Brotherhood's mission statement is to impose sharia law," he said.

"How democracy mixes with Islamic fundamentalism is a challenge. Egalitarianism under sharia law is a challenge. Life as we know it in the West is not possible under these [types of] regimes," Davis added, noting that Hamas rejoiced after Morsi was elected.

He said the best thing Israel can do regarding Egypt is acknowledge Morsi as a new, democratically elected leader and neighbour to the south.

Davis – a former IDF paratrooper who is now a liaison officer in the IDF Spokesman's Office and often briefs foreign journalists on Middle East security issues – was in Toronto to encourage pro-Israel students here to consider attending his school.

About 100 Canadians are currently studying at the IDC, out of a total student population of 6,500, a quarter of whom are international students. It has also formalized an exchange program with St. Francis Xavier University in Nova Scotia. Davis is hoping for more collaboration with Canadian universities in the future.

In the meantime, the IDC recently launched a distance education course in counter-terrorism that he said is the first of its kind on the subject.

Talking about his recent North American speaking tour, which was all about "making the case for Israel," Davis said he's been telling Jewish Diaspora audiences that they must start paying more attention to western groups that delegitimize the Jewish state.

Jonathan Davis

"In certain urban centres such as London, Paris, Berlin, Madrid, Toronto and San Francisco, [Israel's supporters] must learn to deal with the delegitimizers," he said.

"I don't have the answers to all these challenges, but as a representative of IDC Herzliya, Israel's first private, non-profit Zionist university, part of our job is to make the case for Israel, which we do through numerous activities on campus."

He said IDC students learn how to respond creatively to anti-Israel activism and to become proactive about promoting the Jewish state to the public at large.

For example, Davis noted how IDC students took an active role during 2009's Operation Cast Lead by blogging 24 hours a day to the world about Israel's actions and defending the state online in a multitude of languages, including French, Swedish and Danish.

"They reached hundreds of thousands of people via Facebook, Twitter, blogs… Our students, both in Israel and abroad, were defending our soldiers on the electronic battlefield," he said.

Davis had specific praise for Canada's Jewish communities and how they understand Israel better than some other Diaspora communities.

Canadian Jews, are for the most part "very connected" with Israel.

"Part of it may be because [Israeli] immigration to Canada took place at later stages than it did in the U.S.," he said. "But whatever the reason, you feel the warmth. You feel that the [local] leadership is hospitable. One sees that the Jewish community raises a lot of money for Jewish causes and for Jewish continuity in this country.

"The care for seniors. The Jewish summer camps. It's all flourishing in Canada the way it was in the Golden Age of [Jewish communities] in eastern Europe. I feel that compared to some other communities I've visited, the Canadian one is more heimish."

'What kind of a society allows its people to be under such threats?'

He said the situation in the Middle East is very black and white and it's hard for him to understand why people don't see it that way.

"What kind of a society allows its people to be under such threats?… Why should the children in the south of Israel have to spend a week in bomb shelters? It's outrageous. And the Israeli response is, 'We'll build another road, take a detour – it's technical.' But the problem is not technical. The problem is strategic. No other country in the world tolerates this. But we Jews tolerate it," he said.

Schecter said Israel invites and encourages hostile behaviour from its enemies by "not asserting political sovereignty and seeing themselves as grasshoppers – not only in the eyes of the world but in their own eyes, and they've been doing it for 3,500 years."

Schecter explained his use of the term grasshoppers. In Numbers, Moses was told by God to send scouts to Canaan to explore the land. The scouts reported that they saw "the sons of Amalek, who come of the giants: and we were in our own eyes as grasshoppers, and so we were in their eyes."

"As soon as you start taking measures to guarantee your own security, believe me, the world will look up and respect you and you will stop looking at yourself as a grasshopper," Schecter said.

Summer camp inspires educator

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

Aleeza Lubin has an impressive resumé.

With degrees in history and education and a master's from Columbia University in New York, the Toronto native has taught everything from high school math to history.

Now one of three new B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) directors, Lubin, 33, has worked with young people for most of her career, with a focus on keeping teens involved in the Jewish community. But it isn't only her stint teaching at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) or her experiences in New York that fuelled Lubin's career.

It's the time she spent at summer camp, as a camper and as an employee. Growing up in Toronto, Lubin spent 14 summers at Camp Ramah in Muskoka – eight as a camper and six as an employee. It was those last six years that shaped the rest of her life.

"I always worked with the teenagers. Most of the time, I worked with the older kids, the Counsellors-in-Training (CITs). It always felt like, wow, this is such a momentous point in their lives. To reach that final year as a camper, where you have added responsibility... is a big thing," she said.

"You feel as though you're shaping a part of their lives. I saw it as a challenge, which I love. I took it very seriously."

After getting an honours BA from York University, Lubin was drawn to teaching and mentoring positions. She started working at an educational nonprofit north of Toronto before deciding to go through teacher's college at the University of Toronto.

Rather than sticking to history, the current BBYO director decided to try something different.

"In order to become a high school teacher in Ontario, you need to have two teachable subjects. I chose history and math, an unusual combination," she said.

"I was possibly the only person in the entire year who had combined history and math... I love trigonometry. I love algebra. I know. I'm such a dork."

After graduation, Lubin went back to her high school, TanenbaumCHAT, to teach. She saw that the school was expanding and was excited to be part of its growth. But most importantly, she was excited about working with teenagers again.

"[I thought], 'I can have an impact on these kids' lives. A lot of people graduated [high school] and said, 'I'm going to be a lawyer, an accountant, and I'm sitting there... going, 'If you want to be a dancer, do that,'" she said.

"Most importantly, though, I wanted to be able to help them develop as young Jews... It's definitely about showing them the connections [Judaism has] to their lives and making it accessible."

While Lubin enjoyed teaching in the classroom, her favourite moments were usually after school.

"What I was thriving on were the moments outside of the classroom where I was coaching, advising on assemblies, working with students one on one. I was seeing an impact. I wanted that all the time," she said.

In 2007, Lubin left TanenbaumCHAT and moved to New York, where she got a master's degree in American studies.

"I'd taught for four years. I decided it was time to go back to school," she said.

Lubin, who described New York as a "little bit faster and louder than Toronto," earned her master's degree in two years. During that time, Lubin realized that although she wanted to work with young people, she didn't want to go back to the classroom.

Aleeza Lubin

"I didn't want to be limited to a classroom," she said.

Lubin found a national nonprofit Jewish organization based in New York, Bend the Arc (formerly Jewish Funds for Justice), which runs "service-learning" programs for youth and college students.

The group partners with campus Hillels and synagogues and places students in communities across the country so they can volunteer and give back.

While Lubin enjoyed her job with the Bend the Arc, she missed working with teenagers.

"I liked the age group in terms of where they are in their developments. Teenagers are at this point where they're such a sponge. They're taking in so much. They're trying to figure out the world," she said.

"There's something about a teen... [By college], they've already asked so many of those questions. They feel like they already have the answers."

While at Bend the Arc, Lubin learned about a job opening at BBYO, a pluralistic Jewish organization that works to keep teens involved and engaged in their Jewish communities.

Thanks to a $1.9-million grant from the Jim Joseph Foundation of San Francisco, the group was hiring three directors of Jewish enrichment.

After months of interviews and meetings, Lubin won a position earlier this year.

"It'd been a very long and winding process, and it was sort of this relief of 'wow. I'd been so looking forward to this, and now it's actually happening,'" she said.

Getting the job meant moving to Chicago, where Lubin now lives.

"It was an amazing feeling, but also incredibly bittersweet. My five years in New York were amazing... but ultimately, this job felt worth it," she said, adding that her focus for BBYO is on the midwestern region, which includes Winnipeg.

Lubin has high hopes for her position at BBYO, especially since the group, a Jewish nonprofit, is growing and evolving.

"Which, in today's world, for Jewish non-profits, is hard to come by," she said.

"It's thrilling for me to be a part of that, because they're growing and doing such innovative things with young Jews. I'm excited to continue to learn about this amazing movement of young people that is so passionate and strives to get involved in ways that actually are seen, felt and heard."

Who's picking up the tab?

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

I've recently stepped up my search for a serious relationship. I have a profile on JDate and have gone on a few blind dates. I'm pretty good at first date stuff like small talk and where to go, but I'm constantly stumped by paying etiquette.

Being kind of an old-fashioned guy, I like to pay on the first date, but it's the subsequent dates that I'm having trouble with. I'm just out of university and building my career. I can't afford to be spending tons of money on dating. Even a basic dinner is often more than $50, and the same goes for a movie date.

I'm very uncomfortable asking my date to pay her way. Sometimes they offer and sometimes not, but when they do offer, I feel like a "schnorrer" taking their money. Once I went out with a girl who insisted on paying her own way on the first date, and that threw me right off. "If I pay then we are on equal ground," she said. I actually understood that.

Is there a right way to handle this?

Paying Perils

Dear Paying Perils,

Much depends on where and how the date originated. If you met for the first time on JDate, then you're probably not going to a movie or dinner. My guess is you're going for coffee or drinks. You didn't invite her, and she didn't invite you. It's a mutual decision to meet, and usually you each pay for yourselves. If you like her and ask her out again, that will be your first date, and you should pay.

When you ask a girl out, it's your invitation so it's up to you to pick up the tab. On the second date, do something a little less expensive like go for a bike ride or a walk in the park. Maybe stop for some ice cream. See if she offers to pay. By the third or fourth date, she should be dipping into her wallet.

There's a subtlety in the way you approach things. For example, if you go to a movie, you might pay for the tickets and say something like, "How about you pick up the popcorn and drinks?" That's a more natural and comfortable way than buying your own ticket while she buys her own.

Don't let money be the elephant in the room. The whole point of dating is to get to know each other. The way the two of you handle money is very much a part of your personalities. You certainly don't want to come off as a tightwad, but you don't want her to feel like you are overpowering and controlling, either.

Believe it or not, in most situations, it will work itself out fairly easily. Don't keep a balance sheet. You need to be socially intelligent. On a first date, she's judging you on everything: your clothes, your manners, your looks, your personality, your intelligence – just like you're doing with her. There's enough to be aware of without letting this part get in the way of what might bloom into a great relationship.

Think of dating as an investment in your future. Once you have a few dates with the same person, you can actually broach the subject directly if necessary. Treat each other with respect and sensitivity. In the meantime, enjoy the excitement of getting to know the new woman in your life.

Plants are good for the soul

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

As I was leaving for a bike ride I passed my wife, who was out for her morning walk. "I think it was a successful resuscitation," I said.

She asked whom I was talking about. I answered, "The three foxgloves," beautiful plants with purple flowers that I had planted days earlier and had been wilting in the summer heat. I "diagnosed" severe dehydration, so I provided large doses of water. Overnight the leaves filled out, and the tall stems holding the gorgeous flowers were almost upright.

That seemed to be a miraculous feat of plant care for someone who was brought up in Brooklyn and knew close to nothing about flowers or plants. Betty Smith's 1943 novel, A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, had little impact on my botanical knowledge or skill.

My wife had a good laugh, and I biked away, recalling my fond association with the foxglove. When I went to medical school in Scotland in the 1960s, I once went on an outing in western Scotland with some classmates that culminated in a difficult uphill hike on the foothills of Ben Nevis, part of the Scottish mountains. When I stopped to catch my breath, one of my more playful classmates kneeled over me while waving a foxglove and said laughingly in his Yorkshire accent, "Here, Michael, take a nibble of this. It will strengthen your heart."

I had never seen the plant, but from then on, the foxglove's medical importance was imprinted in my brain. At the time, digitalis leaf, a medication used for various forms of heart disease, was derived from the foxglove. It was a less purified form of what is now commonly called digoxin.

Digitalis was introduced into medical practice by William Withering (1741-1799) an English medical botanist. The foxglove plant, digitalis purpurea, had been known for centuries as a folk remedy for the treatment of dropsy, or congestive heart failure, and other conditions. In 1785, Withering published his classic work, An Account of the Foxglove and Some of Its Medical Uses: with Practical Remarks on Dropsy and Other Diseases. His observations changed the course of medicine, and although digitalis is used less in current medical practice to treat heart disease, I have frequently used it in the past and observed its often dramatic life-saving effects. My personal foray into gardening has occurred late in life, but I have witnessed professionally the important therapeutic impact that raising plants can have on elderly people, including those with cognitive impairment and cancer.

The short-story writer O. Henry captured poignantly the life-affirming impact of what was believed to be a lingering vine leaf on a pneumonia-stricken woman in The Last Leaf. The patient's ultimate recovery is at the expense of an old painter who, as his last heroic artistic effort, paints a leaf on the wall facing the window to give the illusion of a still-living leaf, only to contract fatal pneumonia as the price paid.

In the palliative-care unit where I work, there is an active plant group that, with a recreation therapist and dedicated volunteers, helps patients nurture their plants.

One elderly gentleman with advanced malignancy had always raised his own vegetables. His plant project was to grow some tomatoes while he was in the unit, and the joy that he experienced watching his carefully tended blooms yield their produce was a testimony to the life-affirming power of plants living and thriving through our human efforts.

Nearly half of Israelis oppose Iran strike

Asher Zeiger
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Almost half of Israelis oppose a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities to halt its nuclear drive, Israel's Channel 10 reported on Sunday.

A poll conducted by the Dialogue Institute under the supervision of Kamil Fuchs, a professor of statistics at Tel Aviv University, found that 46 per cent of respondents said Israel should not attack Iran's nuclear facilities, 32 per cent advocated an Israeli strike and 22 per cent offered no opinion.

The institute, a non-profit organization based at Temple University in Philadelphia that fosters interreligious and intercultural scholarship and co-operation, published the survey results amid heightened debate among senior Israeli policy officials about the necessity of a military strike to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak have made increasingly vociferous statements about the urgent imperative to stop Iran.

Benjamin Netanyahu

The poll also showed that Israeli support for Netanyahu has waned in the past three months. According to the poll, only 34 per cent expressed satisfaction with the prime minister, as opposed to 58 per cent who said they are dissatisfied. The remainder had no opinion. A similar survey conducted in May found that 46 per cent were satisfied with the prime minister's performance.

The same survey found Israelis prefer Republican Mitt Romney to incumbent Barack Obama as the next U.S. president, by 34 per cent to 31 per cent.

Channel 10 attributed the prime minister's decreased support to the public's perception that he has failed to stand up to the haredim on the issue of a universal military draft, which many secular Israelis, as well as those in the national-religious camp, strongly support.

Baird makes surprise visit to Jerusalem

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird made a surprise visit to Israel Monday morning, stopping at the Kotel to pray with Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz, the rabbi of the Western Wall.

Baird had been on a four-day Middle Eastern trip to Jordan and Lebanon to meet with regional leaders and discuss the impact the crisis in Syria is having on those border countries. He pledged Canada's support to assist with the humanitarian crisis emerging.

He had not indicated Israel was on his itinerary prior to leaving Ottawa on Aug. 10.

Baird was scheduled to conclude his visit to the region on Monday.

At the time of writing, it was unclear whether Baird had scheduled any last-minute meetings with Israeli leaders as well during his brief visit.

Queries to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Reports from Israel indicated Baird was on a personal trip to the holy site.

A Monday morning statement from Rabbi Rabinowitz's office said Baird was in Israel to show support for the Jewish state and to express "his admiration and friendship for the people of Israel and the hope that the friendship with his country would continue and be strengthened."

Canada

Hospital Fundraiser

TORONTO — Former Canadian senator Jerry Grafstein and his wife, Carole, will host a fundraiser Sept. 10 at their home for the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and the North York General Hospital Foundation featuring former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani as guest speaker. Proceeds will benefit children's care facilities at both hospitals equally, organizers said.

World

Essayist Rakoff Dies

NEW YORK — Canadian-born essayist and humourist David Rakoff died Aug. 9 in New York City after a two-year bout with cancer. He was 47. Born in Montreal and raised in Toronto, Rakoff was perhaps best known as a contributor to This American Life on Public Radio International, but he also published three books and was a frequent contributor to a number of high-profile publications.

El Al Airfare Bargain

NEW YORK — Thousands of travellers bought bargain-basement-priced tickets to Israel on El Al Airlines after a third-party mistake sent the price plummeting. The tickets, sold Aug. 6, were going for as low as $335 round trip, the New York Jewish Week reported. El Al said the prices were a third-party mistake, but all tickets would be honoured, despite what some social media users were claiming. People were alerted to the deal by travel website Dan's Deals. El Al said it wasn't sure how many tickets were sold at the low fare.

Duke Heschel Coup

DURHAM, N.C. — Duke University has acquired a collection of the papers of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, including correspondence, publications, documents and photos that have never been available to scholars, Duke said Aug. 7. Rabbi Heschel, an influential 20th-century religious leader, was involved with the U.S. civil rights and anti-Vietnam War movements. He famously marched with Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. in Selma, Ala., and is credited with coining the civil rights slogan, "We pray with our legs."

Former Canadian Avoids Some Charges

Laszlo Csizsik-Csatary

BUDAPEST — Suspected war criminal and former Montrealer Laszlo Csizsik-Csatary of Hungary won't be charged with the murder of 300 Jews in 1941, Budapest prosecutors said.

Csizsik-Csatary's alleged complicity in the murder of some 15,000 Jews in 1944 is still being investigated.

Accusations that Csizsik-Csatary, 97, helped send the 300 to their deaths at the Kamyanets-Podilsky camp in Ukraine are "groundless," the Budapest municipal prosecutor's office said Aug. 8.

He wasn't at the deportation and lacked the authority to be responsible for it, a spokesperson said.

The prosecution is probing allegations that in 1944, Csizsik-Csatary, a senior police officer, was responsible for deporting 15,700 people to Nazi death camps from the Jewish ghetto in Kosice, Slovakia.

Hungarian police arrested him last month based on the findings of an investigation by the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC). Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Center's Israel office, told JTA he would check if Hungarian prosecutors had interviewed any witnesses before dropping the charges. Zuroff said an 84-year-old Holocaust survivor had accused Csizsik-Csatary of arranging for four of her brothers to be pulled out of a labour camp and murdered at Kamyanets-Podilsky.

Police arrested Csizsik-Csatary 15 years after his return to Hungary. He had lived in Canada almost 50 years and worked as an art dealer before being stripped of his citizenship. Britain's Sun newspaper reported on the SWC investigation last month, but Budapest's chief prosecutor said July 17 it "contains no new evidence." Csizsik-Csatary was nonetheless arrested July 18.

Israeli Sunday school partners with Hillel

Kachol Lavan expecting 10% increase in enrolment

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

While some private Jewish schools struggle to keep enrolment figures from slipping, Kachol Lavan, the supplementary school for Toronto's growing Israeli community, is enjoying an annual increase in registration.

With three locations in the Greater Toronto Area, Kachol Lavan's principal Ariel Zaltzman is expecting about 350 students in September– about 10 per cent more than last year – to join the seven-year-old Sunday school program that serves children from junior kindergarten to Grade 8.

Always striving to attract more families, Zaltzman was all ears when Hillel of Greater Toronto's Israel programming director Shirin Ezekiel, approached him with an idea for a new program for university students with young families.

"For the last 3-1/2 years, I've been working with [Israeli] post-doctoral students who are here with their young families for maybe five to seven years, [as well as] former students who have decided to stay because they got work opportunities," said Ezekiel, who is also a former Israeli and the mother of a three-year-old boy.

"We'd been using the Hillel building and resources to have Shabbat dinners and holiday stuff, since most of us here are without extended family. But we're also parents, so we want to give our kids the same experience we had," Ezekiel explained.

"So we started doing activities around the chagim and it felt like a natural step to offer programs for the kids. As the kids are growing, we're worried about them [retaining the Hebrew] language and what culture and traditions we're providing them with."

When she told Zaltzman about her idea and guaranteed that a few families in the downtown area would be interested in a Sunday school program geared for kids between the ages of one and four, he was eager to put something together.

"I was very happy when Shirin approached me and told me there was a group from Hillel that… wanted to retain the Hebrew language, to retain the Israeli culture," Zaltzman said.

Research for life choices

In this week's CJN, we publish an interview by The Times of Israel correspondent Raphael Aren with the revolutionary Jerusalem scholar Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz.

In his typically pointed and iconoclastic manner, Rabbi Steinsaltz expounds upon the far-reaching personal potential to be found in study of and familiarity with, at least to some degree, the Talmud, which for him can be an effective and even magisterial way to develop human character and particularly Jewish, human character.

"Dealing with Talmud is like doing psychoanalysis. At least you're beginning to understand what you are," Rav Steinsaltz told Aren. (Our emphasis) "No part of Jewish culture, on any level, is without some sort of connection to the Talmud, he added."

Later in the interview, Aren summarizes one of the rav's key messages about the study of Talmud: "Once a student understands that learning Gemara is not necessarily about the actual subject the rabbis are discussing but understanding axioms, he can tackle any other problem."

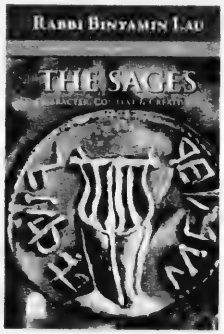
When he speaks about study of the Talmud, Rav Steinsaltz ought to be listened to. He is one of the world's pre-eminent talmudic authorities, as Aren points out.

Koren Publishers Jerusalem Ltd. recently published an elegant new English translation of Rav Steinsaltz's Hebrew edition of the Talmud. (Elsewhere in this edition of the paper, Prof. Martin Lockshin reviews it.)

The main reason that Rav Steinsaltz has laboured for decades to provide a more accessible but no less authoritative version of the Talmud was, as he once succinctly phrased it to "let my people learn." As with all great teachers, he has provided pathways for individuals to walk on their own. He has opened windows through which people might look and possibly see new and startlingly revelatory things.

Because so many of us formed early opinions about Judaism as a severe culture primarily of prohibitions, we tended to back away in later life from even casual curiosity about investigating more of it. So many of us made decisions about the way in which we would live Jewishly without actually knowing too much about the options available. In no other realm of our lives, however, would we make decisions, let alone momentous ones, without first doing the research, without getting the basic information on the subject.

And yet, when it comes to leading a Jewish life – I am categorically not referring here to the leading of a religiously observant life – so many of us simply cast aside the rich history, literature, heritage, customs and values of our storied people without first researching what it is we are casting aside.



Rav Steinsaltz has dedicated the larger part of his life to providing us with personal learning opportunities and resources to do that preliminary research. The new Koren Talmud Bavli is one quite spectacular resource.

There are countless others, although not on as grand a scale as the Talmud Bavli. For example, Maggid Press, a division of Koren Publishers Jerusalem Ltd, has recently published a three-volume work by Rabbi Binyamin Lau called The Sages.

Rabbi Lau is a scholar, educator, social activist, pulpit leader and lecturer. As he explains, The Sages "attempts to trace the development of Jewish thought as formulated by the sages of the Second Temple period."

It is a ground-breaking work. Generally speaking, the Orthodox world has not delved into the context, the history of the time, or the personal natures of the sages whose teachings have been passed forward from generation to generation. But Rabbi Lau does precisely that. Using the tools of academia, itself controversial within the traditional world, Rabbi Lau studies and explains the ideas of the Second Temple sages "against the background of their character and their historical context."

Similarly ground-breaking in the realm of Torah study is the collected divrei Torah of the scholars at Yeshivat Har Etzion, Torah MiEtzion: New Readings in Tanach. The yeshiva, founded in 1968 by the late Rav Yehuda Amital along with Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, is at the very heart of "new" Torah study that has been called a "unique, analytically rigorous, creative interpretive method that is infused with a profound quest for meaning."

The majority of the essays in Torah MiEtzion were originally published in the parshah series of the Israel Koschitzky Virtual Beit Midrash (www.vbm-torah.org), an online locus of study that has been affiliated with the yeshivah for some 20 years.

We have, today, so many tools to help us choose what, if any, Jewish path to walk, to help us know "what we are."

Queen's Park gives approval for 'Al-Quds' rally

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Queen's Park has approved an "Al-Quds" rally on the legislature's grounds that Jewish groups say offended Canadian values and was antisemitic when held last year.

The rally is scheduled for Aug. 18 and is part of a larger campaign to protest "the usurpation of the Holy Land by the Zionist regime." The Al-Quds rallies, which have been held in a number of Canadian and American cities, were the creation of the late Iranian Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Avi Benlolo

Jewish groups are disappointed that Queen's Park's Sergeant-at-Arms Dennis Clark has granted approval for the demonstration. They had argued that last year's event violated Queen's Park's terms of use and this year's application should have been denied.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) called the organizing Al-Quds committee pro-Iran and anti-Israel.

"Allowing this committee to import the hateful dogma of the despotic Iranian regime to the grounds of the Ontario legislature is an insult to all Canadians who are offended by a group of fanatics who pervert our cherished ideal of free speech to spout venom and to promote a profoundly anti-western, anti-democratic theology," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of FSWC.

"It is truly unfortunate that the principles of tolerance and inclusion do not extend to the target of their unbridled hatred – Canada's Jewish community, which remains astonished that such groups are welcome in our public spaces."

FSWC called last year's rally an "endorsement of hate" and "a matter of public safety."

The group said that it "will continue to monitor the situation and pressure police, media, politicians and community leaders to review the laws that permit hate and the support of repressive Iranian-style sharia law free reign in Ontario's public spaces."

"This is no longer a debate about free speech versus hate speech," Benlolo said. "This is an insult to all Ontarians and a simple matter of right and wrong."

Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said that "'Al-Quds' organizers have taken great steps to keep their identities hidden from the public, and in the name of privacy, the government will not disclose their identities, despite the very public nature of this event.

"It is simply not appropriate for the government to shield the identity of the organization behind this public rally.

"Given last year's demonstration where hateful remarks were made by speakers and organizers who singled out Ontario's Jewish community for contempt, such a rally has no place at the seat of Ontario's government. Since the event is in fact a jihadist call to action for the destruction of the Jewish State of Israel and its transformation into one ruled by Islamist sharia law, the very concept of marking 'Al-Quds Day' is offensive to the principles Ontarians live by.

Steve McDonald, a spokesperson for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) held out the hope that the sergeant-at-arms could reverse his decision.

"He still has the opportunity to take our advice" and deny permission for the rally, to take place, McDonald said.

CIJA had provided the sergeant-at-arms with information about last year's rally, in which speakers called Israel and Zionists cancerous, barbarians, parasitic and malevolent.

"We explained why we think vis-à-vis its own policy that it was violated last year and why we expect it will be violated again this year," he said.

"If they allow them to proceed, we'll be watching closely," he added.

Clark told The CJN that he met with organizers of the rally and told "them what they can or can't do. It has to be lawful."

However, "It's important that we don't censor events, as long as they stay within the law.

"If they step over the line, we're going to monitor it closely," with members of his staff and Toronto police on hand. "Police will "determine if it's in the best public interest to do something then or later. Public safety is paramount," he said.

Clark said he's aware of last year's rally and of concerns it will be repeated. But, he continued, "we go by their intent today. They say they will play within the rules and ensure that nothing will cross the line."

As for B'nai Brith's request that he identify the event's sponsors, Clark said "we just don't release the names of the organizers. It's up to them to let people know who they are."

Urdu news service to carry Israeli items

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Weekly Press Pakistan (WPP), a Toronto-based news service, has entered into an agreement with the Tazpit News Agency to carry stories from Israel, some of them translated into the Urdu language.

WPP publisher Tariq Khan said Tazpit will provide him English-language stories and he will translate others and include them in his Urdu-language commentaries.

"It's a good source of information about Israel," Khan said. "I am very proud that people for the first time are coming to know about Israel, what Israel is doing."

Tazpit director Amotz Eyal said the collaboration should expose millions of readers to news and information coming from Israel.

"I am confident that this joint venture will be beneficial to Israelis as well as Pakistanis and will promote understanding between the two parties," he said.

Khan said WPP has been attempting to present its audience with news from Israel that breaks the Urdu-speaking community's misconceptions about Jews and the Jewish state. There is no reason non-Arab Muslims should share the hostility to Israel of Arab Muslims, he said.

'I am confident that this joint venture will promote understanding between the two parties'

In last week's edition, WPP carried a Tazpit story highlighting the Lollapalooza music festival that will take place in Tel Aviv next summer. Another featured a historic look at the Tu b'Av "Valentine's Day" festival, while a third unattributed story celebrated the 89th birthday of Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Featured at the top of the news agency's web page (http://weeklypresspakistan.com/) was a story illustrated by a menorah and Star of David that asked, "Why are Jews so powerful? A Pakistani perspective." The story cites the Jewish contributions to a number of fields, including medicine, science, and popular culture, and attributes Jews' disproportionate successes to education.

Tariq Kahn

Khan said he entered into the arrangement with Tazpit after meeting Eyal in June. "I looked into his website, and when he arrived, we had a frank discussion. He's a good person, a young man with a good team."

The Israeli government has been deficient in making its case to people in South and Central Asia, where Urdu is widely spoken, Khan said.

Khan, who worked for years in various news agencies in Pakistan before moving to Canada, said he never received any news releases from the Israeli government. "Israel was not at all interested in non-Arab Islamic agencies," he said. "I never received a single word from Israel."

Pakistanis' knowledge of Israel is framed strictly by the conflict with the Palestinians, he continued. "People know only the conflict. I'm trying to promote the better aspects of Israel in Urdu."

Khan himself has been involved in several meetings with Toronto Jews to try to foster better relations between local Muslims and Jews. A recent get-together at a Toronto library saw 40 Jews and Muslims enter a "get to know one another" dialogue on a number of non-political topics. Khan co-chaired the meeting with David Nitkin of EthicScan Canada.

Khan hopes to expand the next meeting, sometimes in the fall, to include youngsters under 15.

Egypt's security forces awaken to jihadist threat

The killing of 16 Egyptian border guards in the Aug. 5 attack on an army outpost near Rafah in the northern Sinai by 35 militants – global jihadists and radical Bedouin among them – sent shock waves through Egyptian society.

"Israel has been warning for years now that terrorists from global jihad groups based throughout the Middle East, alongside Palestinians from the Gaza Strip, are using Sinai as a launch pad for attacks into Israel," wrote Yaakov Katz in the Jerusalem Post. "Until now, likely because the attacks were aimed only against Israel, the Egyptians have done hardly anything about this. Now, that might begin to change." Still, Katz assumed that it could take weeks if not months to see evidence of such change.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Yet just three days later, in apparent co-ordination with Israel, Egypt acted decisively, sending Apache helicopters against suspected militants, and, according to Egyptian officials, killing 20. This was far from the first time that Bedouin and others in the Sinai had attacked Egyptian security personnel there. But there had never before been such a concerted, brazen assault and one that resulted in so many Egyptian fatalities.

The international media, preoccupied with the ongoing carnage and chaos in Syria, were forced by the scale and significance of the attack and Egyptian response to pay attention to what was transpiring in the Sinai.

Even though the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and Hamas in Gaza immediately charged that Israel's Mossad was behind the murder of the Egyptian soldiers, most Egyptians just didn't buy it. In a society where anti-Israel conspiracy theories are rife and readily believed, this was quite a departure. But in this case, the evidence that Bedouins and jihadists were the perpetrators was simply overwhelming.

On Aug. 6, Egypt's state-run news agency, MENA, reported that according to a security official "Islamist elements who infiltrated Egypt from the Gaza Strip through tunnels are behind the attacks, along with other Islamists situated in the areas of [northeastern] Sinai."

The following day, according to another Egyptian news agency, Morad Mowafi, head of the Egyptian General Intelligence Service, said the terrorist group behind the attack is spread between Egypt's Sinai and Gaza. Reacting to the accusation that Egyptian authorities had information of a pending attack, but failed to act on it, imperiling its own soldiers, Mowafi reportedly admitted, "Yes we had detailed information about the attack, but we never imagined that a Muslim would kill a Muslim on the hour of breaking the fasting in Ramadan." What he didn't say was that the intelligence had come from the Israelis, who had also warned their own citizens vacationing along the Red Sea about the threat of terrorist attacks.

The failure of the Egyptian authorities to act on the intelligence led President Mohamed Morsi to replace Mowafi and the governor of the lawless northern Sinai region. But Morsi himself was feeling the heat from angry Egyptians. After all, just days before the Sinai attack, he had embraced Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh in Cairo and promised to ease the passage of more Palestinians from Gaza into Egypt through the Rafah border crossing.

As the governing authority in Gaza, Hamas bears responsibility for security and was left in an embarrassing position when it was revealed that Palestinians and others from Gaza, although from more radical salafist groups, had been involved in the assault on the Egyptians. For his part, Morsi did not attend the funeral for the slain soldiers when his security services warned that, given the outrage of ordinary Egyptians, his safety could not be guaranteed.

The burnt-out wreckage of the Egyptian military vehicle commandeered by the terrorists who killed 16 Egyptians and then tried to enter Israel. [Flash90 photo]

It was not lost on the media, especially in Israel, that, as bad a turn of events as this was for Morsi, as well as for the Muslim Brotherhood and its Gaza-based offshoot Hamas, at least Israel benefited, if only in the short term, from enhanced security co-operation from Egyptian military forces, which are finally reacting to the threat jihadists pose to their own country.

Hatred thwarts what could be

The brutal events last week at the Gaza-Sinai-Israel intersection were a sordid reminder that the primary crude that flows thick and black in large amounts throughout the Arab Middle East is inter-communal hatred.

Oil is the other one.

Terrorists from Gaza crossed into the Sinai and killed 16 Egyptian soldiers as the soldiers were eating their fast-ending Ramadan meal. The terrorists, armed with considerable lethal weaponry, then commandeered an Egyptian troop carrier and burst across the Israel border at Kerem Shalom intent on murdering as many Israelis as possible.

The terrorists did not live to carry out their homicidal plan. The IDF stopped them a short distance from the border.

In a rapid-fire set of inter-related moves, Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi reacted quickly to the slaughter of the Egyptian soldiers. It attacked a cluster of putative terrorists in Sinai, closed the border with Gaza, ordered the sealing of the tunnels from Gaza into Sinai, demanded the extradition of certain Hamas men from Gaza to Egypt, replaced the chief intelligence officer, the defence minister, chief of staff and other security officials.

Under the pretext of the attack in Sinai, Morsi has taken over control of the vaunted elite Egyptian military establishment. The personnel moves are still being assessed by Israel.

In an attempt to avoid responsibility for the murder of the Egyptian soldiers, Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh, predictably, blamed Israel. To a willing body of attentive media, he said: "The attack's method confirms some sort of Israeli involvement aiming to achieve political and security goals, cause tension on the border with Egypt and destroy joint efforts to end the Gaza blockade."

In an interesting sidebar dripping with equal parts irony and humanity, that could only accompany a story in the Middle East, it is worth noting that Haniyeh's sister was recently in Israel. And not quite as a tourist.

She accompanied her gravely ill husband to the Beilinson Hospital in Petah Tikvah. Haniyeh's sister and his brother-in-law entered Israel from Gaza at the Erez checkpoint and then travelled by Magen David Adom ambulance to the hospital in Petah Tikva. Haniyeh's brother-in-law was hospitalized in Israel for about a week. The Israeli medical team saved his life. He and his wife, Haniyeh's sister, then returned to Gaza.

The life-saving treatment for the Gaza couple in Israel is not a rare occurrence. It happens quite frequently. But for the fact that Ismail Haniyeh strives daily to destroy the country, the hospitals, the doctors and the nurses who saved his brother-in-law's life, it would happen even more. That it does not is the result of the ongoing, Haniyeh-like hatred that thwarts what could be.

25 years ago in The CJN

Histadrut secretary general Yisrael Kessar ordered the labour federation's industrial leaders to break all commercial ties with apartheid South Africa once existing contracts had expired. ## Zionists affected by U.S. segregation

That Ze'ev Jabotinsky, the father of Revisionist Zionism, was concerned about American blacks is not news ("Ze'ev Jabotinsky's little-known anti-racist legacy," Aug. 2). He wrote in 1910 that there was not "anywhere in the civilized world," including Russia and Romania, "the kind of inequality" that existed in "democratic" America, and that lynchings in the American South were worse than the pogroms in Kishinev. His early novel, Virginia, revolves around the complicated psychology of an American southern woman raped during a slave rebellion and her Swedish husband. In some respects, Jabotinsky wrote, Jews were better off in czarist Russia than in the United States.

What Rafael Medoff fails to mention in his article on the (72nd, not 70th!) anniversary of Jabotinsky's death is the context for his subject's feelings. Most of the early Zionists were profoundly affected by American segregation and deeply moved by Uncle Tom's Cabin, which Jabotinsky called, the single "book which most directly influenced history." Former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir was similarly appreciative of it, and the book was one of the few novels in founding prime minister David Ben-Gurion's library. The founders of the state on the right and the left were acutely sensitive to prejudice and inequality anywhere, which they invariably saw as analogous to the experiences of the Jewish People. They understood from their own lives why a Jewish state was an imperative, but their perception did not blind them to the suffering of others.

I wrote about all of this some two decades ago in my book, The Israeli-American Connection: Its Roots in the Yishuv, 1914-1945.

The Olympics

It should come as no surprise that the Palestinian Authority would object to the request for one minute of silence to commemorate the massacre of the 11 Israeli athletes butchered in the 1972 Munich Olympics. After all, this is a society that names its streets and parks after suicide bombers and celebrated the death of thousands of Americans during the 9/11 attack on the World Trade Center.

Commendations should be given to U.S. President Barack Obama, our federal government and the Italian delegation to the 2012 London Olympiad who supported the request for one minute of silence. Also to be applauded is Brian Williams of CTV and Bob Costas of NBC, who voiced their support when the Israeli athletes walked into the London stadium.

I am not surprised that Canada's Dick Pound has remained silent. During past Olympics, he refused to acknowledge letters criticizing the International Olympic Committee for not punishing and expelling Iran for failing to compete against Israeli athletes. I would have expected more from an Olympian and a high-ranking IOC member.

Gov't cuts to archival program

Library and Archives Canada (LAC) has eliminated the $1.71-million National Archival Development Program and made drastic cuts to its staffing due to the recent federal budget ("Archivists denounce federal budget," June 14). The cuts – a total of $10 million over three years – will lead to the loss of specialized professionals who process the records and care for them so they can be made available in person or digitally to researchers in Canada and around the world. It takes more than simple scanning to keep these important documentary resources available to researchers in perpetuity.

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

Genealogy is much more than formulating a family tree for one's amusement – there are much more serious reasons for doing this type of research, including finding lost or estranged relatives, such as survivors of wars or of the Holocaust; genetic research, such as tracking genetic diseases in families in order to avoid spreading these; finding a bone marrow match in families (genealogical research has saved lives), and finding siblings or relatives unwittingly separated as a result of tragedies or catastrophes.

One of the things that might have been done to help avoid having to make such drastic cuts is to have increased the fees for researching and mailing documents to those who request them. I would ask this government to please reconsider the recently implemented devastating budget cuts to LAC.

'The Talmud has the quality of sanity'

Raphael Aren
The Times of Israel

Which book should be at the core of Jewish education? Most educators would probably point to the Bible without thinking twice, but Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz happens to disagree. While not doubting the importance of Bible study, he would prefer that the Talmud, or Gemara, stand at the centre of the Israeli school system.

"It's a central pillar for understanding anything about Judaism, more than the Bible," said Steinsaltz, one of the world's best-known Talmud scholars. "The Talmud is not a divine gift given to people. The Jewish People created it. But on the other hand, it created the Jewish People. In so many ways, we're talmudic Jews, whether we believe in it or not."

Does one have to believe in God to appreciate Talmud study? Steinsaltz doesn't think so. "Do you have to believe in Shakespeare?"

No other book has shaped the Jewish People as much as the Babylonian Talmud, said Steinsaltz, 75. He should know. He spent nearly five decades writing a comprehensive commentary on all of the Gemara's 63 tractates, which deal with everything from civil, criminal and ritual law to Jewish history, ethics and mythology.

"Dealing with Talmud is like doing psychoanalysis. At least you're beginning to understand what you are," he said. "No part of Jewish culture, on any level, is without some sort of connection to the Talmud."

The Talmud records the legal and religious discussions thousands of rabbis had over centuries until it was compiled in about 500 CE. It constitutes the foundation of Jewish law, practice and customs to this very day and forms the core curriculum of Orthodox yeshivas.

But Talmud study would be helpful even outside the yeshiva world, Steinsaltz believes. Replacing the Bible with the Talmud as the key book taught in Israel's schools could help the Jewish state become a more balanced and stable society, he said.

"The Talmud as a book has the enormous quality that the world needs now more than anything else: sanity," Steinsaltz told The Times of Israel recently in his study, located on a serene street in Jerusalem's Nahlaot quarter.

"The Talmud is the book of sanity. And when you study it, it confers a certain amount of sanity," Steinsaltz said, suggesting that the most fanatical rabbis are rarely great Talmudists. After all, the Gemara consists mainly of logical and rational, back-and-forth discussions about legal issues, aimed at arriving at a factual truth, he points out. What could be more sane than that?

"It was a big mistake to make the education in Israel based so much on the Bible," Steinsaltz said, between puffs on his pipe. "Because the Bible was written by prophets. If you read the Bible, you somehow become, in your mind, a little prophet. That's the way Israelis speak to each other – they don't have conversations, they all have complete and unlimited knowledge. Learning Talmud would bring a big change to the Israeli mind, because it deals with and is connected to dialectic."

Talmudic discussions are indeed often methodological attempts to arrive at a just conclusion on the basis of scrutinizing a legal problem. But the Gemara is not always "rational." Sometimes it delves into the supernatural. Certain segments speak, quite literally, of the power of demons or magic amulets. One particularly baffling segment describes how several sages created vegetables and other food items for their own consumption pretty much ex nihilo, by merely uttering some magical formulas.

Steinsaltz, a white-bearded all-round scholar who has published more than 60 books on subjects ranging from Jewish mysticism to zoology, has many responses to such challenges. One of them refers to The Screwtape Letters by Christian writer C.S. Lewis, a novel describing the correspondence between a senior demon and his apprentice. One of the first lessons the senior demon teaches his student is to make the humans believe demons have horns and a tail. "Because if the humans see you, they will never recognize who you are," Steinsaltz quoted with a smile.

"I don't know why we shouldn't believe in demons," he said. "We see enough of them walking around in human form, don't we?"

Witty stories aside, Steinsaltz, is well-versed enough in modern science to confidently posit that whoever believes in the latest physical theories should not be bewildered by Jewish mysticism.

"If you study the physics of today, you are no longer astonished about anything," he said. As an example, he mentioned String Theory, which – grossly simplified – speaks of at least twice as many dimensions as the classical model of Einstein's relativity, and which physicists predict will replace the world's current understanding of the universe. "The cucumbers in the Gemara will sound to you nice, sane and pretty much real-life after you read it."

Steinsaltz's first name, "Adin," means gentle or tender in Hebrew, which characterizes him well: he smiles and is friendly, and speaks so quietly that it almost sounds as though he's whispering. During our interview, he patiently answered every question – often interjecting personal anecdotes and quotes from Plato to Pushkin into his responses – until his aides intervened and politely threw me out.

Born in Jerusalem to secular parents, Steinsaltz studied mathematics, physics and chemistry before embarking on a rabbinical career. At 23, he became Israel's youngest school principal. His claim to fame, however, is his groundbreaking commentary to the almost 6,000 pages of the Babylonian Talmud, a labour of 45 years. He completed the monumental project two years ago, providing a commentary that helps Hebrew speakers decipher the complicated text of the Gemara, which was written in ancient Aramaic and without punctuation.

In what has come to be known as "the Steinsaltz edition," the classical medieval commentary of Rashi was given a different place on the page, and this was one of the reasons that parts of the haredi world deemed Steinsaltz's commentary unacceptable. Some hardliners shunned Steinsaltz and his text: the late Rabbi Eliezer Menachem Shach, for example, called him a "heretic" and forbade students to consult his commentary or even debate him.

But the ban did not hold. Many prominent Orthodox rabbis had plenty of good things to say about the Steinsaltz Talmud, and today it can be found on countless bookshelves around the world. According to the website of Shefa, the organization publishing and promoting Steinsaltz's works, students include Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman, celebrity lawyer Alan Dershowitz and former Italian prime minister Giulio Andreotti. In 1988, Steinsaltz received the Israel Prize, and earlier this year, he was among the first recipients of Israel's Presidential Award of Distinction.

Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz

For Steinsaltz, learning Gemara is more than merely studying. As he writes in the preface to the new Koren edition, released this summer, his work aims to allow Jews to study the Talmud, "approach it, and perhaps even become one with it."

What does that mean, becoming one with the Talmud?

"It's a matter of identification," Steinsaltz said, puffing on the pipe again. Sometimes people see or read things but remain estranged from them, even if they fully comprehend the content. For some Talmud students, a superficial knowledge of the material might be enough, but his goal is to allow readers to be able to "get involved" with the text, he said.

"The Talmud is a language of thinking. In order to be fascinated by it, you have to somehow either acquire it or admire it," he says.

As you'll have gathered by now, Steinsaltz himself is totally sold on the Talmud's value: "In certain ways, it is far more relevant than mathematics," he said. "Because most of mathematics has no relevance to anything, not in this world and not in the world to come."

Many a mathematician has attacked Steinsaltz for such statements, the kind he has been making in hundreds of articles and lectures over the years. He's unrepentant. Despite his knowledge and appreciation of natural sciences, he considers that people trying to convince laymen of the importance and helpfulness of mathematics are "con men," he said. "It's funny, but even the mathematics you need for making a satellite is not very high mathematics," he insisted.

Yet the Talmud, Steinsaltz argued, is eternally relevant.

"If you learn Gemara, you don't really know what to do as a Jew today," he admitted, since it mostly recounts discussions whose conclusions – if there are any – are not necessarily binding in contemporary religious law. "But, as in mathematics, some of these things are the basics, and you build on them later." In other words, the Talmud's dialectic discussions teach the student the know-how he needs to approach any question that may arise.

Once a student understands that learning Gemara is not necessarily about the actual subject the rabbis are discussing but about understanding axioms, he can tackle any other problem, the rabbi said.

Uninitiated people, glancing at a page of Talmud, might scoff at the apparent obsolescence of the matters discussed, many of them originating from a pre-modern, mostly agrarian society. Why would anybody care today who is responsible for the damage to an earthen vessel caused by oxen on the loose?

"Some of the questions are about oxen, and some are about the breaking of shards. But these are only examples," Steinsaltz said. Every old book suffers from outdated examples, and even at the time it was written, the Talmud was "not always up-to date," he allowed.

But the deeper imperatives remain. When the Gemara deals with the laws of damages, it uses oxen and shards, but the same principles its uses can today be used for cars and iPods or anything else. It's about primary damages and secondary damages, intentional damages and unintentional damages, those that could have been avoided and those that were bound to happen, and so on.

"If you don't get it beyond the shards and the cow, then you didn't really learn Gemara," Steinsaltz said. "Everybody who thinks that an ox is an ox is himself an ox."

Believable and not-so believable Jewish film characters

"The sun is warm, the sky is blue..." It's the silly season that hits Vancouver every July and August, when the sun finally comes out.

We got into a discussion of movies in which non-Jewish actors play Jews.

We know that actors are, well, actors, and given a part, they'll take on any persona called for. So of course a non-Jewish actor called on to take a role as a Jewish character will do what it takes to make the role not just credible, but totally believable.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

Here are some favorites.

Prompted by a beefcake picture of Daniel Craig as James Bond (and who doesn't wish 007 was just a teensy bit Jewish? After all, his first name is Daniel), one immediately pictures him as the assassin in Munich, where he was given the immortal line: "The only blood I care about is Jewish blood."

Umm, moving on to Defiance, in which Craig plays Tuvia Bielski, who flees with his brothers to the forests of Belorussia after his town is massacred. Now there's a real-life hero, slashing his way through Nazis to save terrified Jewish villagers during World War II.

My husband swears that Craig started his career playing Motel the tailor in Fiddler on the Roof, but I think he's just jealous.

How about that arch villain/victim Shylock in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice? We came up with portrayals of him by two very different actors. Laurence Olivier played Shylock as a sympathetic character in a 1973 film, doing everything in his power to make us feel the man's pain at losing his daughter and his livelihood to his arch enemy. A much more nuanced Shylock was brought to us by Al Pacino in 2004, working way out of character and making us feel for Shylock in spite of his flaws (Shylock's, not Pacino's).

Another nomination, memorable for other reasons, was Fagin, played by Alec Guinness in a 1948 version of Oliver Twist. I have seen part of that movie, and the portrayal of Fagin, who certainly was not a sympathetic character in the original, was nothing short of cartoonish. His characterization would have been right at home in a Nazi stereotype worthy of a Streicher cartoon. Since I had admired Guinness in many roles, when I saw that film clip, I was horrified, and I've never looked at Obi-Wan Kenobi again in the same way.

Sadly, Guiness was a truly great actor. I hope in his later career he regretted his ugly antisemitic portrayal of Fagin.

To give the devil his due, the film was banned for a time, but Guinness' damage was done. Imitators followed his version for some time.

Then there's Meryl Streep. That woman can play anything, and that includes her turn as a rabbi in the DVD version of Tony Kushner's Angels in America. If I come back as an actress – a most unlikely occurrence – I want to come back as another Streep. Her accent as the rabbi who delivers a eulogy at the start of the movie was amazing. So was the eulogy.

Or how about the really buff Brendan Fraser (The Mummy) playing a Jewish student in School Ties? One can believe him as an athlete – the Jewish part, not so much.

Speaking of that era, the 1950s, one must mention Gregory Peck in Gentlemen's Agreement. He was only pretending to be a Jew, but June Havoc who played a secretary pretending not to be Jewish, actually was. Are you following this?

And no list of non-Jewish actors playing Jewish roles would be complete without mentioning Moses, portrayed by Charlton (National Rifle Association) Heston. When he rolls up the jello waters, you just know he'll save the nation. I fear, however, that eventually he came to believe that he actually was that powerful.

As I say, that's called acting.

One could go on: other suggestions were Adrian Brody as The Pianist and Jessica Tandy as Miss Daisy in Driving Miss Daisy.

I close with John Goodman, the Jewish wannabe. In The Big Lebowski, he refuses to bowl on Shabbos. When it's pointed out that he isn't Jewish, he argues that he's converting. Hah!

Yes, ironies abound. Daryl Zanuck, for instance, made Gentlemen's Agreement after being refused entry to a club because they thought he was Jewish – he was not.

And that's Hollywood!

Memory, memorials and irony

I understand that science knows very little about the brain and how it functions. Thankfully, when injured, it's flexible enough to regain function in unused sectors. But when it comes to clarifying the processes of memory, scholars are at a loss.

How do we remember and why do we remember?

For human beings, memory is critical, both for individuals as well as for the collective.

Memory guards our past and converts it into a heritage, without which we cannot claim a future. It's not just a matter of seeking continuity as individuals or as a community. It's also about addressing our human need for legitimacy and authority. Our very existence and distinctiveness as a species seems to stand on this connective tissue of memory.

It appears so elusive, yet, without understanding the physical mechanism, we can look to its social mechanism. We have a variety of human social institutions that ritualize and confirm collective memories of key happenings. We celebrate personal or national events in a variety of ways through religious and national festivals that enable us to maintain and reflect upon certain memories that are essential to our distinctive identities.

This past summer, we marked two momentous and tragic moments in history. Both had been undeclared.

Seventy years ago, on July 16, 1942 in France, 13,152 Paris Jews were gathered in the Vel' d'Hiv roundup and taken to the death camps. Fewer than 100 survived. The roundup was conducted by the French police, not the Nazis. This year marked the first commemoration of that event in France. It stands as a primary example of the processes of history, forgetfulness, memory, responsibility and memorial.

On the other hand, we have the anniversary of the 1972 Munich Massacre and the absence of any sense of responsibility – in the sense of responding to it – from the International Olympic Committee (IOC).

Forty years ago, 11 Olympians were kidnapped and massacred. They happened to be Israeli nationals. Therein lies the tale. If they were from any other country... but then they would not have been targets if they had been from any other country. Not only did Israel make a plea for a minute of silence at the opening ceremonies of this year's Games, but the victims' surviving relatives openly called for some recognition, some format for a moment in time.

Eventually, countries such as Canada and the United States joined the appeal, but the IOC refused. Despite all the contrary facts and arguments, it said the Games weren't the appropriate venue for such a memorial. What nonsense! They held memorials for 9/11 and in Vancouver for a dead luger. What liars.

The 11 Israelis who were murdered died as Olympians, symbols of all the values of the Olympics. They came to represent their nation in peace, in a sporting event, putting aside political divides and issues, to show the world that it's possible. But the murderers undermined that very Olympic spirit, and by not holding a memorial, the IOC gave a victory to the murderers! It allowed them to blackmail the Games, to hold them hostage once again, and to thus reduce those very Olympic values. Never again will we be able to watch these games and claim that they stand for peace over politics, or that we can overcome what divides us. (As if we ever could after the 1936 games.)

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

So what do we learn?

The collective does not want a memory with Israelis in it. Holding a memorial would have claimed these 11 Israelis as truly Olympian. By refusing to do so, the world community has said that they remain Israeli, not Olympian. Why? This is the face of the new antisemitism. It is not anti-Judaism. The disdain and odium is directed against all things Israeli now.

Thus, I found it quite ironic that at those very same Olympic Games this summer, something Israeli woke up the audience and the world.

When the American women's team won the gymnastics' gold, did you notice the last number? Alexandra Raisman, a Jew, sealed the victory for the U.S. team with a floor performance that had everyone clapping rhythmically, joyously in the gym. The whole crowd was with her as the judges gave her the needed score for a great victory. And the tune that brought the house down while she performed? Havah Nagilah, that great old Israeli song.

Turkish Jewish scholar promotes Ladino

Karen Gerson Sarhon is fighting a rearguard action to save Ladino – once the lingua franca of Sephardi Jews – from utter extinction.

Founder and director of the Istanbul-based Ottoman-Turkish Sephardic Culture Research Center, she is frankly glum about Ladino's prospects.

"It's dying," said Sarhon, a 54-year-old former English teacher who established the institute in 2003 under the auspices of the chief rabbinate to document, collect and transmit the rich cultural treasury of the Jews of Turkey. "My generation is the last Ladino-speaking generation."

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

Nonetheless, Sarhon, who has written two MA theses on Ladino, is doing her level best to nurture it.

She edits El Amaneser (The Dawn), one of the last remaining Ladino newspapers. A monthly with a circulation of 4,000, including 300 overseas subscribers, it appears as a one-page supplement in Salom, the official organ of Turkey's Jewish community.

She has also compiled a data base of 80 hours of spoken Ladino, culled from native speakers.

Ladino was at its peak in the 19th century, when it was the language of communication in the far-flung Ottoman Empire, which stretched into the Balkans and the Middle East.

"Ladino was the most important element of Jewish identity in the Ottoman Empire," said Sarhon. "Few Jewish women could speak Turkish. Jewish men who knew Turkish spoke it with a heavy Jewish accent."

A form of 15th-century Castilian Spanish, with words borrowed from Hebrew, Turkish, Arabic, Greek and French, Ladino was transmitted orally. Its speakers were Jews expelled from Spain in the late 15th century.

Sometimes called "El Espanol Maestro," or "Our Spanish," Ladino was also referred to it as "Djudesmo."

Ladino basically developed three dialects, reflecting the countries to which Spanish Jews fled in the wake of the great expulsion. Western Ladino emerged in the Balkans: Greece, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Serbia, Bosnia and Romania. Oriental Ladino sprouted in Turkey, the successor state of the Ottoman Empire. Haquitiya sprang up in North Africa, mainly in Morocco.

For centuries, Ladino was written in Hebrew characters, its alphabet having been devised by Rashi, the medieval rabbi and rabbinical commentator.

With the advent of the Turkish republic in 1923, Ladino began using the Latin alphabet.

In retrospect, Ladino has suffered a long decline.

Two hundred and fifty thousand Jews were fluent in it a century ago, compared to 40,000 Jews worldwide today. Some 200,000 Jews, however, have a rudimentary knowledge of Ladino.

"They can say a few words," said Sarhon, who learned Ladino at home from her parents.

In Turkey, there are upward of 8,000 Ladino speakers in a Jewish population of about 18,000. Sami Kohen, an 83-year-old journalist who writes a foreign affairs column for the daily newspaper Milliyet and once edited his father's Ladino newspaper, is a member of that declining group. "I speak and read Ladino," he said. "But my children don't."

In Israel, where 100,000 Jews of Turkish descent and their children and grandchildren live, there are 25,000 Ladino speakers.

There are also pockets of Ladino speakers in France, Bulgaria, Belgium, Canada, the United States and Latin America.

According to Sarhon, Ladino is withering because it has lost its function as the "home language" of Ottoman Jews.

The first blow was struck by the Alliance Israelite Universelle, a Paris-based organization founded in 1860 and dedicated to providing Jewish children with elementary school and vocational training in French. By the dawn of the 20th century, there were 115 such schools in the Middle East, with the bulk in Turkey, Morocco and Tunisia.

In Turkey, French displaced Ladino. "Jews speaking only Ladino were considered uneducated and looked down upon," said Sarhon. "French had status. It was the language of the elite."

This trend was hastened by the creation of the Turkish republic, which encouraged the use of Turkish. "It became shameful to speak Ladino outside the home," she said. "My father learned Turkish when he was inducted into the army in 1941."

During the 1930s, in a further bid to encourage the use of Turkish, the Turkish government shut down Alliance Israelite Universelle schools.

"With this development, the prestige of Ladino dropped even more," she said. "By the 1970s, Ladino was regarded as a jargon rather than a language. The expectation was that it would be dead in 10 or 15 years."

Karen Gerson Sarhon

El Amaneser is printed in Ladino.

The Holocaust was a bitter blow as well, resulting in the deaths of some 100,000 Ladino speakers.

In the 1980s, fate intervened and handed Ladino something of a reprieve as Sarhon and like-minded Turkish Jews began exploring their Sephardi culture and Ladino heritage.

By the age of 19, she spoke Ladino fluently, having learned it in order to perform in high school plays.

In Israel, meanwhile, an institution to perpetuate Ladino was opened under the patronage of Yitzhak Navon the then Israeli president. The quincentennial of the arrival of Spanish Jews in the Ottoman Empire gave Ladino yet another boost.

The Cervantes Institute, founded by Spain to promote Spanish language and culture in foreign countries, was another step in promoting Ladino, she observed.

Apart from El Amaneser, Ladino periodicals are published today in Israel (Aki Yerushlayim), Belgium (Los Muestros) and France (Aki Estamos). La Lettre Sepharade ceased publication in France several years ago.

There are also digital Ladino publications in Argentina and Izmir, Turkey.

Additionally, a handful of Ladino books, ranging from dictionaries to cookbooks, are published annually in countries such as Turkey and France. Ladino language courses are taught at Israeli, U.S. and European universities, but not at Jewish day schools.

Despite an upsurge of interest in Ladino studies of late, Ladino's future remains hazy and uncertain, Sarhon said, noting that her 15-year-old daughter is not a Ladino speaker. As she put it, "We speak Turkish and English at home."

What to do after you move out; sponsorship and support woes

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

Question: My wife and I recently decided to separate after 21 years of marriage. Every time we try to discuss the details of the separation, we argue. I therefore decided to move out of the matrimonial home in the hopes of resolving things more amicably at arm's length. I'm staying with my brother for the time being but am looking for an apartment.

Has my moving out compromised my rights to the matrimonial home?

Answer: You have not compromised your rights provided you act quickly to officialize your actions by having a family law lawyer inform your wife in writing of your intentions and take the necessary steps in court in the absence of a signed separation agreement. If you don't do that — and simply continue to live away from the matrimonial home for months or years without any formal legal agreement with your wife — you could have problems. You may indeed be compromising your rights, especially if your child or children continue to live in the home with your wife and especially if the house is registered solely in your wife's name.

The very fact that the two of you are unable to carry on a conversation about separation details without arguing suggests very strongly that you should both hire a competent family law lawyer to carry on that conversation for you. That does not mean that you are foregoing the right and ability to speak for yourselves. On the contrary — you are re-opening lines of communication that are now blocked.

Residents of Vaughan face lengthy delays

And if you're hoping for a quick resolution, you hopefully don't live in Vaughan when you separated. If you are a resident of Vaughan at the time court proceedings are initiated on your behalf, your case will probably take several months longer to come to trial than if you were a resident of Toronto. Nothing personal against the fair city of Vaughan, which I call home. It's just not the best place to reside in when you have legal proceedings pending due to current lengthy delays.

Question: I am a Canadian Citizen. I sponsored my newly wedded husband to come to Canada. Within two months he split and I'm heartbroken. Do I have to wait one year to get divorced? Am I on the hook for him if he goes on welfare?

Answer: You have to wait one year of separation until a court can grant a divorce judgment. However, you can commence your divorce action at any time within the year. This is important since when the one year is over, by starting the action early you will save about two months waiting time in the process.

Secondly, when you sponsored your husband to come to Canada you signed a contract with the taxpayers that if he goes on welfare you are on the hook to repay what he took from the public purse. So start praying that he doesn't go on public assistance.

There are a growing number of cases where both men and women (equally women) pretend to many a Canadian citizen. Then shortly after getting landed immigrant status and arriving in Canada they leave the marriage. They simply deceive their partners and Immigration Canada by using the marriage as a vehicle to short-circuit the immigration application process.

The end result is heartbreaking for those Canadians who truly thought they'd met their match, sort of like Puccini's Madame Butterfly in reverse. Women are often emotionally or even physically abused and then abandoned by such phony immigrants. Men often spend large sums on mail-order type brides and then find that the woman had not the slightest intention of continuing with the relationship. By victims reporting such cases, the RCMP and Immigration Canada are beginning to successfully prosecute such individuals.

Zareinu to take part in provincial study

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto will be part of a provincial study that will assess agencies that help children with developmental challenges.

The study, being conducted by the Whetstone Group consultancy under the direction of the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services, is slated to begin later this month.

It "will be used to inform policy and program development for children and youth with special needs" said ministry spokesperson Courtney Battistone.

She added that the other two organizations in the study "are yet to be confirmed" and that "there is no plan for additional partnerships with or additional funding for any of the organizations being reviewed."

Mitch Parker

Zareinu receives assistance from the Ontario Trillium Foundation and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and also raises money through numerous charitable initiatives.

Mitch Parker, Zareinu's clinical director, told The CJN the study will help Zareinu gather essential data on how well it is delivering service to its clients.

Reached by phone on vacation in Michigan, he said the study would help evaluate "the quality and efficacy of our services and then report back to the government."

He said that at this point, he isn't sure how the government plans to use the results or whether they might translate into more provincial funding for Zareinu.

Parker said he received word in June that the province had tabbed his organization to be included in the study. The province has been talking about conducting a study for the last few years, he said.

"We'd been having repeated meetings with members of various ministries about trying to put Zareinu on the [province's] radar screen," he said. "As a result, the government seems to have heard us and are going to take a look."

For its part, the province says it's looking into how to help institutions such as Zareinu better deliver specialized education and services to children and youth with developmental challenges.

"The study will look at how these agencies delivered services in an integrated and multidisciplinary way," Battistone said.

She added that the ministry will "examine in detail organizations in Ontario that specialize in coordinated and integrated programs for children and youth with special needs in an educational setting; include an inter-jurisdictional and literature review summarizing co-ordinated and integrated service plans for children and youth with special needs in an educational setting that are relevant to Ontario, and then recommend how outcomes for children and their parents receiving integrated multidisciplinary services in a school setting could be best measured for potential future application to program evaluation and research."

The study should be submitted to the ministry next spring.

Parker said Zareinu is indebted to former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO and provincial Liberal candidate for Thornhill Bernie Farber for helping connect the institution with "contacts at the ministry."

Farber is a longtime supporter of the school.

Zareinu provides therapy and special education to children with a wide range of physical and developmental challenges from birth to 21 years in a Jewish environment.

Emissaries from Israel set to arrive in Toronto

Fourteen young emissaries from Israel will arrive in Toronto next week for a year of interaction and education with Jewish students in the city. Part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Engagement program, the emissaries, known as "shinshinim," will billet with local families and take part in programs at Jewish schools, synagogues and other community institutions. They replace an outgoing team of 12 emissaries who head back to Israel to begin their military service. The shinshinim program derives its name from the first letters of the Hebrew words "Shnat Sherut," denoting a year of service after high school. The goal of the project is to give Toronto kids a sense of contemporary Israel. Pictured, top row from left are, Shani Barzilay, Or Cohen, Yehonatan Ben-Ishai, Inbar Erez, Ben Yael, Adi Novak, Re'em Korine, Noa Tubiana and Shoval Rozenberg; middle row, from left, Alon Reichman, Mor Ani, and Nevo Ben Ya'akov, and front row, Gal Baruch, left, and Gefen Chazen.

School not just for Israeli community

"Kachol Lavan will open programs in any areas where we see a demand."

Ezekiel sent out an email to a few young Israeli families to get a feel for how big the demand was.

"What happened was that the families I had connected with forwarded the email to their friends, and suddenly I was getting emails from all kinds of people saying they wanted more information," she said.

The next step was to meet with Michal Hass, one of Kachol Lavan's teachers, who will be joining University of Toronto in September as an instructor of modern Hebrew.

After polling some of the interested families about what kind of programming they wanted for their kids, Hass began working on a curriculum that combined culture and tradition.

"When I saw the curriculum, I was shocked. It contained books and music that we grew up with as kids. It was everything we had envisioned – a cultural connection," Ezekiel said, adding that the program was a hit with the families as well.

Kachol Lavon teams up with Hillel

Initially, Ezekiel and Zaltzman hoped to attract enough children to fill one class, but with weeks until the program starts in September, there are already enough children, about 30, to fill two classes.

Zaltzman insisted that although Kachol Lavan promotes Israeli culture, "this is not just for the Israeli community. It's for everybody, for the whole community."

There are about 60 students from non-Hebrew-speaking families in its programs, and about 70 from Russian families who came to Toronto via Israel.

He added that within the last three years or so, there has been a shift within the Israeli community.

"The Israeli community wants more to engage with the local community," he said.

As a result, the school, which operates as a joint initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Schwartz/Reisman Centre and the Israeli Forum, will offer time for prayer to those who are interested in adding a religious element to the largely cultural, secular program.

"I got many emails this year from families who want their children to say the prayers. Why? Because they were not born in Israel, they will probably stay here and they need to know what's going on in the [Toronto] Jewish community," Zaltzman said.

"This year, there will be an extracurricular activity in the morning, before school starts. After the holidays, there will be a session of prayer. Whoever wants to come, come. Whoever doesn't want, doesn't have to."

He hopes the fact that he's giving the participants a choice, rather than forcing it on them by incorporating it into the regular curriculum, will be more effective.

Ezekiel said she also noticed that young Israeli families are catching on to the idea that becoming a part of the broader Jewish community in Toronto means embracing religious Jewish traditions.

"When we were asking people what they wanted to get out of the program, everybody said, 'Culture, culture, culture – the books, the songs, etc.' But then, they also said, 'What about the Jewish holidays, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur?' They understand that they need to make an effort because it's not like in Israel, where it's Rosh Hashanah everywhere."

She said in areas like Thornhill, where there is a higher concentration of Jews, you get more of a sense that there is a Jewish holiday, but downtown, it's not as obvious.

"Especially downtown, you have to make an effort. They realize now that it is a challenge," Ezekiel said.

In addition to the Sunday school program, Kachol Lavan also offers choir programs for adults and children, Israeli folk dancing, Hebrew classes for non-Israelis, a Grade 6 bar/bat mitzvah program and a Holocaust education program for Grade 7 and 8 students.

U of M law students tour Israel

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A group of first-year University of Manitoba law students saw a "different side of Israel" on a recent tour of the country sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU).

During the three-week tour this past May, the students learned about the Israeli legal system, its constitutional developments and its interaction with international law.

The students' agenda included lectures about the role of the Supreme Court in Israeli society; laws that protect intellectual property in Israel; Jewish and family law; the basic nature of international law generally, and trade law in particular, as well as current challenges involving the mix of politics and business in the area of trade relations.

"We were able to visit the Supreme Court of Israel, test-drive electric cars at Better Place [a company that aims to bring affordable electric cars to the mainstream] and hear from a legal adviser to the IDF counterterrorism division," said Alexandra Miles, one of the students who went on the tour.

Bryan Schwartz

"Each of these experiences, along with many others, presented a different side of Israel and reflected the struggles that the nation faces and the solutions that are being implemented to address those issues."

The tour was part of the Mishpatim program, which was founded last year by U of M law professor Bryan Schwartz, in conjunction with the Winnipeg chapter of the CFHU. Schwartz, who has been on U of M's faculty of law since 1981, is the inaugural Asper Professor of International Business and Trade Law.

Schwartz, who led the tour, said that "Israel has had to face many of the challenges – often at an especially intensive and complicated level – that Canada has had in respecting individual and minority rights in general, and in the particular context of addressing security threats, including terrorism.

Miles said the trip was an invaluable opportunity to get to know Israel's legal system and in particular, its nascent constitutional framework. "The program provided a wide variety of experiences that coalesced to demonstrate the unique features of Israeli society," she said.

For student Caroline Reimer, the tour was a "life-changing experience. It exceeded my expectations," she said.

"We are hoping," Schwartz said, "that the lessons learned will give Canadian students much to think about in terms of lessons to be emulated or avoided in addressing some of the comparable problems in Canada – itself a society with traditional peoples, such as First Nations citizens, many newcomers from all over the world, and interested in developing a culture of risk-taking and innovation."

Last year, the inaugural year of the program, the group consisted entirely of U of M law students. This year, the 23-person group also included two Asper School of Business students and three law students from the University of Saskatchewan.

The students heard lectures from an Israeli terrorism expert, an Arab Israeli clerking at the Supreme Court and a Druze professor. They visited Hebrew U, the University of Tel Aviv, the Technion, the Bahai Centre in Haifa, a Jewish Ethiopian absorption centre and a workers hotline, an NGO dedicated to protecting workers' rights.

"We are very grateful to the provincial government for its financial support this year, which is linked to its interest in having our students exposed to the various comparisons and lessons to be learned from Israel's own successes and setbacks," Schwartz said.

He added that the second tour has been more successful than the inaugural one because it "introduced students in both law and commerce to a wide range of issues that intertwine law, politics, sociology and economics. Our speakers and material were diverse in perspective.

"The hope is eventually to have a program that has a Manitoba core, but accessible to students across Canada in both law and business."

A daf a day

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin

On Aug. 1, about 93,000 people gathered in the MetLife Stadium in New Jersey to complete the Talmud together. Since 1923, when the young Polish Rabbi Meir Shapiro first proposed the idea, Jews around the world have been studying a daily daf (two-sided page) of the Babylonian Talmud, day in and day out, rain or shine. Since there are 2,711 of these dafs in the Talmud, it takes about 7-1/2 years to complete this daily, or daf yomi, cycle. This month's celebration was the 12th, and by far the largest, such completion.

Large Jewish communities throughout the world held local celebrations and joined the Jews in New Jersey via video link. In Toronto, some 2,500 people assembled at the Sony Centre downtown. The feeling of packing a theatre with Jews of all ages and stripes, and joining the throngs in New Jersey on the screen, was pure inspiration. As we all completed the last lines of Tractate Niddah, everyone broke into singing and dancing.

Our joy was not just because we felt a sense of educational accomplishment. This was also a victory for the Jewish People over our enemies. Despite all their efforts over the centuries, we remain the thriving "people of the Book," a book that has kept us alive all this time.

At our synagogue, we have three daf yomi classes every day. Most days I enjoy the intellectual challenge of having to figure out what these 2,000-year-old sages were conveying, but at times it's been quite taxing on my aging brain cells to clear out the cobwebs so early in the morning. Fortunately, many in the class are themselves accomplished scholars and keep me on the straight and narrow.

Rabbinic Reflections

More than any political cause, more than any organization, Torah study has kept our people united and alive over the centuries. This was palpable Aug. 1 in New Jersey and at the Sony Centre. Jewish literacy can only be accomplished through committed study of our texts. If you seek Jewish literacy, if you want to ensure Jewish continuity for the next generation, nothing is as effective as dedicating a portion of your day to studying Talmud.

And it isn't just for Orthodox Jews. The Talmud collects the greatest wisdom of Rabbi Akiva, Hillel, Rav Ashi and hundreds of other voices that shape the Judaism of today. Join a daf yomi class. If your synagogue doesn't offer one, ask your rabbi to start one.

But here's the best reason to learn the daf: Fred Stoll was a kind, lovable man who had a great following of admirers in the Toronto Jewish community. He built a beautiful family of multiple generations. On Aug. 1, Fred attended the party at the Sony Centre, since he had attended the daf yomi lectures for the past 15 years and finished the entire Talmud for his second time. He had no formal yeshiva training, just a love for learning. That next Friday, a few hours before the new cycle of the Talmud was to begin, Fred passed away peacefully. He had been struggling with his health for two years, but something kept him hanging on. Of course, it may have been his wonderful multi-generational progeny who gave him a continued reason to live. But it also may have been a drive to finish the Talmud just one more time before having the curtain fall on a wonderful life.

The Talmud gave Fred life. May it do the same for you.

Going out of business

In the past few months, three long-time Jewish establishments that combined have served the Toronto community for close to 150 years have closed down. The rapid changes in the economy have made it increasingly difficult for "mom and pop shops" – in this case a bakery, a bookstore and a restaurant – to compete.

This is most unfortunate for the community and, more importantly, for the affected businesses and their employees. Besides the economic costs, there's the personal pain and feeling of loss of years and years of hard work, only to be left with little to show for it. These closings are just a microcosm of the economy as a whole. The jobless rate remains stubbornly high, with economists predicting this will continue for many years.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

While there is some debate as to the nature of protection that society can and should offer businesses from competition, the mainstream Jewish view is that it should provide very little. While some Jewish courts might enjoin a second pizza store from opening if there aren't enough customers to support two, that represents a minority view. "Let the best business win" is the strategy that serves the greatest public good. All agree that if a new entrant just lowers profits of the competitors, no protection would be afforded.

In deciding economic policies, the benefit of the many must take precedence over the needs of the few. Progress does come at a cost. Competition is good for the consumer, but that good can at times, sadly, be achieved only at the expense of the few. Free trade has brought enormous economic benefits, and Israel, for example, has spent much effort in negotiating such agreements, helping to turn it into an economic powerhouse. One hears voices opposing free trade – from politicians concerned about some local businesses, or from environmentalists who oppose (in theory) almost all forms of economic development – but rarely, if ever, will an economist express opposition.

What Jewish law does offer businesses that are struggling to compete is protection against predatory pricing – selling below cost, thereby driving out the competition, at which point losses and more can be easily recovered.

The only "protection" the community can offer most businesses is patronizing them. Our tradition teaches that all things being equal, we should support our co-religionists. This feeling of brotherhood should come naturally to us. Likewise, we should make a special effort to buy Israeli products.

However, this show of support need only go so far. If the quality is inferior or the prices higher, one is not expected to forego better alternatives. Yet it would seem that, especially today with the difficulty of competing against megastores, it behooves us to support our own if the cost is only slightly higher. We should be willing to slightly inconvenience ourselves and to pay a little more to help support our own, even if we feel this is only delaying the inevitable.

The competitive nature of today's marketplace makes it incumbent that our community do its utmost to offer ancillary services such as employment counselling, internships and interest-free startup loans to enable people to meet the challenges of tomorrow.

Modern readers will appreciate the Koren Talmud Bavli

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

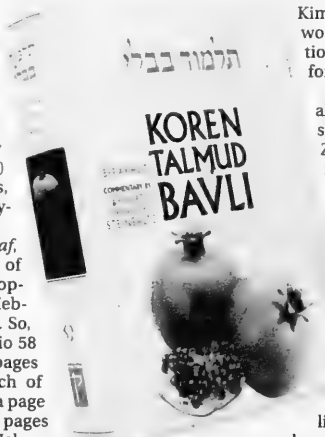
The team at Koren Publishers of Jerusalem is making another bold effort to capture part of the market for high-quality English translations of Jewish religious literature. Joining up with Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz of Jerusalem, the author of the most successful modern Hebrew annotated translation of the Babylonian Talmud, Koren has produced a handsome first volume of the new English-language Koren Talmud Bavli, tractate Brachot, which deals with laws of blessings and prayers.

The volume makes available to the English language reader the excellent tools that Rabbi Steinsaltz is famous for in his Hebrew work: maps, illustrations, helpful historical notes, and language notes that draw upon the skills of experts in Persian, Greek, Latin, classical Hebrew and Aramaic – all of which are necessary for an accurate understanding of the Talmud's unique language. For the benefit of beginners, both the Hebrew/Aramaic text of the Talmud and the commentary of Rashi are printed with vowel points.

The publication is timed for a niche market: Jews who study the daf yomi, the daily folio (a folio being the two sides of a page) of Talmud on a fixed schedule. The 7-1/2-year cycle began again this past Aug. 3 with Brachot. Koren has announced plans to keep pace with the daf yomi schedule in publishing the rest of the volumes. All volumes, including this one, will be available in print or through an iPad app.

Koren's major competitor is the 73-volume Schottenstein Talmud, the most impressive achievement of the haredi publisher Artscroll. That English-language Talmud has gained acceptance in modern Orthodox and haredi circles in North America to a far greater extent than Rabbi Steinsaltz's modern Hebrew Talmud.



First in manuscript, and then with the invention of the printing press, many versions of the Talmud were produced over the years. The layout of the page (tzurat hadaf) of the 19th-century Vilna edition (published by the Widow and Brothers Romm) became, in many religious circles, the only acceptable text for studying Talmud.

Out of deference to tzurat hadaf, Schottenstein prints every page of English translation and notes opposite the relevant page of the Hebrew/Aramaic of the Vilna edition. So, for example, the two pages of folio 58 in the Vilna edition require 11 pages of English in Schottenstein. Each of those 11 pages appears opposite a page of Hebrew, so folio 58 takes 22 pages in Schottenstein. In Koren, the Hebrew page is not repeated, so the original and the English (with slightly shorter notes) take up only nine pages total. That's why Brachot appears in two fat volumes in Schottenstein but in one slightly slimmer volume in Koren.

The Schottenstein volumes ignore historical issues due to their strict adherence to the Vilna edition. (All my examples in this review are from that same folio 58.) For example, the Talmud instructs that when you see a Jewish sage, you should say a blessing thanking God for giving of His wisdom to "those who revere Him," but if you see a gentile sage, the appropriate blessing thanks God for giving of His wisdom "to flesh and blood." That's the way these blessings appear in traditional prayer books. But in the Vilna Talmud, the text of the second blessing thanks God for giving of His wisdom "to His creations." Koren helpfully explains the origin of this variant in the Vilna Talmud: "The censor made this change to soften the contrast between... ['] Those who revere him ['] . . . emphasizing their connection with God, and... ['] Flesh and blood, ['] which indicates no such connection. The formula... ['] To His creations, ['] indicates that non-Jews have a connection to God as well." In Schottenstein, no explanation is provided for the fact that the text of this blessing in their Talmud differs from the one in the prayer book (including all Artscroll prayer books).

The censor's hand in the Vilna Talmud led to a Babylonian rabbi castigating a Jewish man for having intercourse improbably with "an Egyptian woman." Of course, the original text read "a gentile woman." Koren restores the uncensored text; Schottenstein sticks with "Egyptian." In Schottenstein, another fourth-century Babylonian rabbi is accosted by a "Sadducee." The Sadducees, a Jewish sect, ceased to exist in the first-century. Schottenstein does not explain this anachronism. Koren restores the original Hebrew word of the passage "min," accurately translating it "heretic." (The censor had removed that word, mistakenly assuming that it was an insult to Christians.)

In addition to being unconcerned about historical issues, Schottenstein seems indifferent to scientific precision. For example, Koren has a reference to God making Ursa Major, Orion and Pleiades. In Schottenstein the reference is to "Ash, Kesil and Kimah," with a note that these Hebrew words are "the names of three constellations," as if there were no English names for them.

The differences between the editions also involve values. The Talmud tells the story of the second-century sage, Ben Zoma, who recited a blessing upon seeing a large crowd of people, thanking God for, "creating all these [people] to serve me." Ben Zoma then explained, "How much effort did Adam exert before he found bread to eat? He plowed, sowed, reaped . . . sifted, kneaded and baked, and [only] thereafter ate. And I wake up and find all of these prepared for me." Schottenstein's notes explain (approvingly) that Ben Zoma was part of the tiny class of people who are the true purpose of creation, those who will establish close relationships with God. Other people are here on earth "to serve such individuals by cultivating the land... (If the men of learning had to do all this . . . such preoccupations would leave them no time to study Torah or perform mitzvos.)" Koren avoids this hierarchical interpretation and interprets Ben Zoma's remark as promoting the value of universal interdependence: "Human society benefits from a division of labour and each individual benefits from the service of the entire world."

For English-speaking Jews with modern sensibilities who care about history, science and precision, the Koren Talmud Bavli is the obvious choice.

Flying home to Camp Kadimah

Michael B. Soberman
Special to The CJN

The best part of any trip is coming home! Unless, of course, the trip you're taking is to your second home.

For 22 years, my second home was Camp Kadimah, a small Zionist summer camp in Barss Corner, N.S. Each year, I would count the days until I could return there for what were the most formative experiences of my early life. Quite simply, I am who I am because of that place and all the people I met there.

So why did I, a Toronto-born-and-bred Jewish guy, go all the way to Nova Scotia to find a Jewish immersive experience? Were there not Jewish camps closer to home? The answer is simple… tradition!

My parents went to this camp and wanted their children to have the same positive Jewish experience. But at age 14, I fought fiercely not to go. But thankfully my parents were victorious and I reaped the benefits. The single negative moment was when I asked my parents, "Why did you not send me when I was seven years old?"

Determined to ensure the same mistake was not repeated, I began preparing long before my first child was born. Before becoming engaged to my wife, Rebecca, I invited her on a trip to Nova Scotia, and by design, we stopped to visit this quaint, little camp. There I explained to her that my children would attend only this camp. If she did not agree, then our future together might not be a certainty. Thankfully she agreed that our children would attend Camp Kadimah. What she did not know was at what age!

At age two and again at age six, we schlepped our daughter, Jordyn, to Camp Kadimah to visit, to get acclimatized (brainwashed) that this was her camp. Then as she approached her seventh birthday, I recalled the very question I asked my parents – but I was worried she might not love camp as I did. Was she too young? Could she really manage three weeks away from home, her parents and little brother? Then I remembered the magic of Camp Kadimah and how such a special place could mesmerize any Jewish child.

Her experience, I am glad to report, was a success. My daughter has fallen in love with the place I never stopped loving. She is friends with my friends' children, the same way I am with my parents' friends' kids. She insists on singing Birkat Hamazon after every meal, hums Israeli songs and is looking forward to her next maccabiah (colour war). She cheered for Israel during the Olympics and was so proud during the Haganah night activity at camp that she made it to Israel.

How my daughter identifies as a Jew and a human being is now being shaped by a little Zionist summer camp in Nova Scotia – and I have never been more proud of her. I only hope that she does not ask me, "Daddy, why did you not send me when I was five years old?" If she does, then in two short years, we will have to pack our three-year-old son, Joshua, and send him off to camp, something I am not sure my wife will agree to, at least not yet!

Jordyn Soberman and Darah Ross

But at some point in the not too distant future, Joshua is sure to follow in his sister's footsteps and begin spending his summers by getting on an airplane destined for the Maritimes – flying home again to Camp Kadimah.

Will the circle be unbroken?

Candace Alper
Special to The CJN

Thirty years ago, I was a nine-year-old girl from Dundas, Ont., on my way to a place that I had never heard of – Camp Gesher, near Cloyne, Ont. I spent the first of six consecutive summers with people in the place that I would spend the rest of my life crediting for shaping my worldview and my identity as a Jewish girl, later teenager and today, Jewish woman and parent.

Not every one is lucky enough in her lifetime to say that something truly was bashert in a life-changing kind of way. For me, this was it. In my house, we were not particularly observant or affiliated with a synagogue that had a summer program. I only ended up at Gesher because I had a cousin from Ottawa there, and they had room for me midway through the season.

At Gesher, I lived out every summer as part of a closely knit community that honoured and celebrated our culture, heritage and commitment to Israel and the world. We lived together, contributed to the care of our space, we learned, we sang, we danced. We welcomed Shabbat with a celebration at the beach as the sun set over the lake. These special moments have been so meaningful and represent to me the spirit of our community.

The impact of my summers at Gesher lasted throughout each year and carried me through to opportunities and leadership roles in my Jewish community. I was active in BBYO, went on Anguish to Hope, a program that gives Canadian Jewish students the opportunity to witness the remnants of Jewish life that existed in prewar Europe, and volunteered for the Shoah Foundation, for which I interviewed Holocaust survivors. I led an Israel Experience program that took 40 teenagers to Israel for the first time. All of this and more, I attribute to my time at Gesher, for fostering in me the need to be part of this community.

Candace, Eric and Hannah Alper at Camp Gesher

Flash-forward 30 years. My daughter, Hannah, is nine years old and it's her turn now. To ease her nervousness about being away from home, I shared my memories of experiences and friends that are with me still. My Gesher friends left comments on Hannah's blog (www.callmehannah.ca) that read like love letters to camp, sharing hopes that separately and together we pass on to our children.

As I filled her duffle bags, I filled her with my hopes and she was off. Then it hit me: had I set up an expectation for her to feel, have and find what I did, to the point that could lead to disappointment? Would she think she disappointed me if she didn't feel what I did? These are the things that consumed me and kept me up all night in the days after she left.

I didn't need to worry. During Alumni Weekend, I could see that my daughter was beginning to make her own memories. We arrived just before Shabbat. After a joyful and tearful reunion, the first thing Hannah said was, "I want to stay until the end." We spent the weekend with Hannah living my Gesher and her Gesher together. We joined my past with her present and future as we sang, danced and shared memories. At this point, it is important to note that "gesher" is the Hebrew word for "bridge."

On the outer walls of one of the cabins it was painted, "Let the circle be unbroken." How true. These are the things that traditions and communities are made of and built on.

CJA campaign aims to increase donor numbers

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While the amount of money given to Montreal's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) has remained one of the highest per capita among North American Jewish communities, the number of donations has dropped over the past decade.

Evan Feldman, general chair of the 2012 fundraising drive, said CJA's donor base has shrunk by more than 5,000 over the last 10 years, suggesting that a smaller number of people are having to make larger contributions in order to meet campaign targets.

The good news is that although a determined effort to find new givers launched in 2010, that trend has started to reverse, he said.

This year's campaign will be officially launched Aug. 22 at Place des Arts, where Academy Award-winning actor Jon Voight, an outspoken supporter of Israel and opponent of antisemitism, will be the guest speaker.

In 2001, CJA received 20,937 donations, despite a difficult campaign due to the shock of the 9/11 attacks. By 2008 when the recession hit, the total was 17,337.

The decline began to level off in 2010 at 16,251 donations, due in large part to the campaign leadership recruiting more than 1,750 new donors.

The majority of those people – 68 per cent – gave again last year – when another 2,100 new gifts were recorded.

In dollar terms, this new money was significant. The new donations in 2010 amounted to about $750,000, and when called upon again in 2011, those donations had increased to $1.1 million. Last year's 2,100 new donors were contributed a total of $850,000.

Nevertheless, the total number of donations reached a decade low of 16,207 in 2011.

Feldman, who at 44 is, to his knowledge, the youngest ever general campaign chair, acknowledges it's an open question what the result will be by the time the drive officially ends in November.

At the formal closing of the 2011 campaign, Federation CJA was projecting that it would collect $41.1 million. No campaign dollar goal has been set this year.

Feldman said the falling number of donors could be attributed to well-known demographic changes in the Montreal Jewish community. The proliferation of other philanthropic causes is also probably having an effect, he said.

A wild card in this year's campaign is the provincial election and a possible change of government. Feldman agreed that if it looks like the Parti Québécois will win, the community's mood might shift. Concerns about the economy and personal assets could be heightened.

Among the incentives being offered new donors (and their canvassers) is that for each one, a hot kosher meal will be given to the needy. The cost is being covered by the Women's Philanthropy campaign chair, Heather Adelson.

The approximately 800 volunteers who solicit donations are being told that their mission is nothing less than "the survival of the Jewish community of Montreal."

The canvassers' guide prepares them to counter possible objections from prospective donors, such as having given to another organization, the campaign's administrative costs being too high, or questioning CJA support for certain programs or the level sent to Israel.

Feldman, who works in a family housewares and hardware business, became involved with the federation about a dozen years ago, mainly at the urging of his aunt, Laya Feldman, a longtime volunteer.

One of his stipulations was that he not ever have to ask people for money. More than a decade later, as the father, with wife Osnat, of three pre-teen children, Feldman realizes just how crucial fundraising is to vitality of the community.

Feldman and Adelson are heading one of the youngest campaign teams in recent memory, a reflection, he thinks, of his cohort's realization that their generation must step up.

"CJA makes the broadest and deepest impact on the community in a relatively short period of time," he said. That's the message he will try to spread to as many Montreal Jews as possible, especially those who don't realize where the funding comes from for so many of the community's institutions and programs.

As for spending priorities, Feldman said, "The number 1 focus of the campaign is strengthening Jewish identity, whether through formal or informal Jewish education, camping or trips to Israel," he said.

The Aug. 22 campaign opening will include a musical performance by Hagit Yaso, a winner of Kochav Nolad, Israel's version of the TV show American Idol.

Another major event during the campaign is the women's division's Choices. American comedian Carol Leifer, writer and producer of such TV programs as Modern Family, Seinfeld and Saturday Night Live, is the scheduled guest speaker for the Oct. 16 evening. It will be held at the Embassy Plaza in Laval.

Baird open to idea of legal options against Iran: Cotler

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Foreign Minister John Baird was receptive to counsel that Canada should seek more international support for using legal options against Iran, Liberal human rights critic Irwin Cotler told The CJN after meeting with Baird recently in Ottawa.

Back from a visit to the Middle East earlier this summer, Cotler has been writing, meeting with Israeli leadership (including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu) and lobbying to increase efforts to counter Iran's strategy of "denial, deception and delay" in furthering its nuclear ambitions.

"It is clear to me this is what Iran is doing," Cotler said in a recent telephone interview. "What we really need to implement is a series of legal and juridical remedies."

Based on findings by the all-party Canadian foreign affairs committee and the international Responsibility to Protect (R2P) coalition, which Cotler chairs, Cotler told Baird Canada could work with such like-minded nations as the Netherlands, Italy, Australia, Germany and potentially others in seeking to hold Iran accountable.

The coalition's conclusions were, Cotler said, "to the effect that Iran has already committed the crime of incitement, prohibited under the [UN] Genocide Convention and international law; and Canada and other state parties to the Genocide Convention have a legal responsibility – not just a policy option – to hold Iran and its leaders to account."

Cotler has also argued that Iran could be brought before the International Court of Justice in The Hague.

At the diplomatic level, Cotler told The CJN, Iran is essentially mocking the work of "P5+1" nations (the five United Nations Security Council members – United States, United Kingdom, Russia, China and France, "plus" Germany) in trying to keep Iran in check through negotiations.

"In fact, I would say that Iran is using negotiations as a means to nuclear enrichment" and "weaponization," he said, "by denying, deception and delay."

Even if you accept the idea, as some do, that Iran would not necessarily use a nuclear bomb even if it had one, mere Iranian possession of one would "completely alter the strategic calculus," Cotler said. "Iran would still constitute a clear and present danger."

Cotler has been elaborating on the issue wherever he can and recently delineated 13 "undertakings Iran must be called upon to do" to satisfy concerns about the nuclear question and lead to "abandonment of its nuclear weapons pursuit."

He also is seeking more international co-operation against Iran's frequent state sponsorship of international terrorism by Hezbollah and other groups, adding that such international effort should use the expertise of Israel, "the leading target of this Iranian wave of terror."

One obvious way includes enhancing sanctions against Iran, Cotler said.

The recent bombing of an airport bus filled with Israeli tourist in Burgas, Bulgaria, reflects "the lethal convergence of Hezbollah operatives and Iranian instructions," Cotler has written.

On another issue, Cotler said Baird was also open to the idea of making representations to Russia to finally "come clean" on the fate of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat credited with saving tens of thousands of Jews during World War II.

"The smoking gun as to his fate is known to be in Russian archives, so the burden is on them," Cotler said.

Cotler is also continuing to work on the case of Ouda Tarabin, an Israeli Bedouin in Egyptian custody since 2000 for allegedly entering Egypt illegally.

Breathing new life into a small community

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Alan Marcus, the president of St. Catharines' Congregation B'nai Israel, is determined to breathe life into the small-town Jewish community by capitalizing on the influx of Jewish retirees to the area.

"I live in Niagara-on-the-Lake, and I see a lot of Jews who are not members who either weekend here or have moved down here," said Marcus, who has been the shul's president since January.

"I'm trying to convince my congregants that we are not a sleepy, dying, small-town congregation. I hope I'm right," he added with a laugh.

Marcus, who was born in Montreal, raised in Toronto and moved to Niagara with his wife about 20 years ago, became an active member of the 87-year-old synagogue about eight years ago.

Marcus said he sees the value in bringing together the 1,000-plus Niagara region Jews.

He said one of the biggest challenges he faces in his role as shul president is "overcoming the inertia because the older members just assume this is a dying congregation and assume that as everyone dies off, that will be the end of it."

Over the years, many young families have moved away and as a result, Jewish-run businesses have also been lost, he said.

"Jewish farmers and small merchants have gone, but what we've gained are retirees and the knowledge generation that comes through Brock University and the medical complex."

Set to open next year, a new state-of-the-art hospital being built in St. Catharines and affiliated with Hamilton's McMaster Medical Centre, is attracting doctors and specialists to the area.

Marcus wants to reach out to the new Jewish Niagara-region residents who were attracted to the area either by the new hospital or the lower cost of living compared to big cities like Toronto.

Alan Marcus

"I've been telling people that we really need to pull out all the stops and create a community centre and shul that people will see as a reason for wanting to live down here," Marcus said.

B'nai Israel member Miriam Gersho, who moved to Niagara Falls from Toronto in 1980 for a job, said she initially thought that when she retired, she'd move back to Toronto.

"But I fell in love with this place and I have no need or desire to go back."

She said she feels fulfilled by the Jewish community in Niagara region, which was established when a German tailor moved his family to St. Catharines in 1855.

"When I lived in Toronto, I never paid much attention to the Niagara region. I didn't know it had a vibrant Jewish community and so much to offer."

And now, she added, others from Toronto seem to be catching on.

"We noticed that we've been getting new members from Toronto, and we'd like to encourage that to continue. Our membership is getting older and we'd like to welcome new people."

She said although the Jewish community in Niagara consists mostly of retirees, there have been a few younger families who have recently chosen to settle there.

A young family that immigrated to Canada from Russia a few years ago chose to settle in Niagara Falls because of the more affordable housing prices compared to Toronto and because working from home was an option.

She said they also considered that the shul offered a Hebrew school program for their preschool age child.

The fact that Rabbi Eliyahu Courante, who has been serving the Conservative shul's 150 members for the past 10 years, is young and Russian-speaking – he briefly served as the chief rabbi of Siberia and the Russian Far East – also appealed to them, Gersho said.

Gersho praised Marcus for his vision and drive to attract more Jews to become active through the shul and community centre, which are housed in the same building.

"What's different about him is that he recognizes that a synagogue is more than a sanctuary, more that the services. He has wonderful ideas for living Jewishly."

Perhaps the most drastic change on the horizon for B'nai Israel is a shift toward becoming an egalitarian shul.

"As of now, there are no women in the minyan, but we are very close to getting over that hurdle and that should make quite a difference," Marcus said.

"Many people in the Niagara region are people who have intermarried, people who are Reform, who don't join B'nai Israel because it's not egalitarian. But we're moving in that direction."

Clearly, Marcus isn't content to let the 110-year-old congregation die out.

"We have a group of people who are actively out there, looking for young people who they can attract to our Hebrew school, the JCC, and the modernizing of the rituals in the synagogue. I'm pushing on a lot of different fronts."

Wallenberg stamp to be issued in 2013

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadians will soon be able to mail letters bearing the image of one of the most renowned of the Righteous among the Nations: Raoul Wallenberg.

Last week, Canada Post announced it would issue a Wallenberg stamp on Jan. 17, 2013, exactly 28 years after the country posthumously bestowed honorary citizenship on him.

Raoul Wallenberg

It will mark the first time an honorary Canadian receives the distinction.

The Swedish diplomat and humanitarian helped save tens of thousands of Jews by issuing passports and setting up diplomatic safe houses while stationed in Nazi-occupied Hungary during the Holocaust.

On Jan. 17, 1945 the Soviet army liberated Budapest and subsequently captured Wallenberg, imprisoning him in the Soviet Union where he reportedly died less than two years later.

There has been much speculation about why he was arrested by the Soviets and where and when he died while imprisoned, but no motive for his capture has ever officially been released.

In a statement last week, Canada Post president and CEO Deepak Chopra said the plan to create the stamp is "a fitting way to mark [Wallenberg's] courage and his contributions to our country, and we are proud to add him in our stamp program."

Steven Fletcher, minister of state for transport, described Wallenberg as "a shining example of incredible courage" for his actions during World War II.

He would have turned 100 on Aug. 4.

Wallenberg is also an honorary citizen of Israel, the United States and Hungary.

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, commended Canada Post for its decision to issue the stamp.

"A commemorative stamp for Raoul Wallenberg is not just a symbolic act. It will help raise the profile of a person whose courage served as a beacon of light during such a dark period," Ziv said in a statement.

"The stamp's release... will conclude a series of commemorative events and educational programs. The Embassy of Israel is proud to be part of a wider network of partners, including the government of Canada, the embassies of Hungary and Sweden, and Jewish organizations across the country. Activities taking place in Canada are part of a global initiative marking the 100th anniversary of Mr. Wallenberg's birthday."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) also lauded the news.

"Under any circumstances, this is a very fitting tribute, but at a time when we are in desperate need of individuals who can serve to inspire Canadians about speaking truth to power, taking the high road and moving beyond their comfort zones to make a difference, there's an added dimension of significance," Fogel said.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies Canada, said he was "delighted" to know the stamp would be coming.

"Commemorating Wallenberg's legacy of courage and moral fortitude in the face of absolute evil is an inspired decision by Canada Post. His efforts to save close to 100,000 Jewish Hungarians from the horrors of the Holocaust continue to be celebrated around the world," Benlolo said.

A spokesperson for Canada Post told The CJN that the design of the stamp has yet to be determined and that it is still too early to know how many stamps or how many versions would be issued.

He said more particulars about the stamp would likely be revealed closer to the New Year.

CLASS ACTS

Lawrence Park student tops in TDSB last year

18-year-old finished with 99.7 per cent average

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Sean Goldhar, 18, was one of two top scholars in the Toronto District School Board this past year.

The recent graduate of Lawrence Park Collegiate Institute finished school with a 99.7 per cent average, the same as Run Ze Cao, of Martingrove Collegiate Institute.

Goldhar, who has spent up to 20 hours a week playing Junior A hockey, said that balance is "a big thing" for him.

"You read ahead and prepare before the class. That way the class would help solidify [what you've learned.]"

His English mark – 98 – was his lowest.

In an interview at his home, at a media event organized by the TDSB, Goldhar, who graduated with eight awards, said he typically spent two to three hours a night on homework.

"Absolutely, I had to work hard," he said. "I love studying, and I love reading and learning. It's the farthest thing from a chore. It's a lot of fun."

This summer, Goldhar is working in a cancer research lab at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Medical school has always been a dream of his, he said, but now that he's had a taste of research, he's thinking of pursuing a PhD as well as an medical degree.

His parents are also both in the sciences – his father, Steven, is a physician, and his mother, Barbara, is a physiotherapist.

In September, Sean will enter the life sciences program at the University of Toronto.

Despite his academic accomplishments and numerous academic and athletic awards, Sean is very humble about his achievements, Barbara said.

Sean and his twin sister, Laura, are typical kids, she added.

Laura also graduated with honours from Lawrence Park and was recruited by St. Lawrence University in Canton, N.Y,. to play National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) tennis.

Barbara said she and her husband always told their children to "set the bar high" and to do whatever they do to the best of their abilities."

Theatre's artistic director journeys to Poland

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It was an emotional time in late May and early June for Steven Schipper, the longtime artistic director of the Manitoba Theatre Centre (MTC).

Schipper and his wife, Terri Cherniack, arrived in Poland on May 29 for a roots journey to Schipper's parents' hometown. En route back, during a stopover in England to see some theatre productions, Schipper learned that he had been inducted into the Order of Canada.

"It's a humbling experience to be named to the Order of Canada," Schipper said. "This is an award I share with my family, friends and co-workers at MTC."

He also expressed his appreciation to BBYO (B'nai Brith Youth Organization) in Montreal, where, he said, he learned the leadership skills that contributed to his success in the theatre world.

Schipper, who is celebrating his 25th year at MTC (23 as artistic director – he was associate artistic director for the first two years), is the son of Holocaust survivors Jack and Regina Schipper, who still live in Montreal, and were originally from the town of Rzeszow in southeastern Poland near Krakow.

Schipper said his mother's nuclear family survived the war in Siberia. His father and a brother survived thanks to one of their father's employees, a man named Franek Gwiewek, who came up with two sets of forged identity papers for them.

"After the war, my parents were forever sending Franek and his family packages of clothing and other goods," Schipper said.

Sponsored by the Grubert family, Jack Schipper came to Winnipeg after the war. In 1950, he moved to Montreal where he met Regina.

"My zaide had a sawmill in town on land he owned," Steven Schipper said. "For years, my father has been working on regaining his family's land or getting compensation. He has been back to Rzeszow a couple of times to visit Franek and in pursuit of his claim. I have wanted to go back with him, but we hadn't been able to work that out."

The impetus for Schipper to go to Rzeszow himself came from his friend, Ruben Potash, also the son of Polish-born Holocaust survivors. Potash joined Schipper and Cherniack for the early part of the trip before heading off on his own.

"My father wasn't able to join us," Schipper said, "but we were able to Skype him from a lawyer's office in the town."

The Schippers' journey started in Krakow where they stayed the first night in a hotel in the old Jewish quarter. The next day, with Potash, they drove to Rzeszow.

"We had a wonderful tour guide and translator," Schipper said. "She arranged for us to meet with the archivist in Rzeszow."

The archives, he noted, are housed in what used to be Rzeszow's largest synagogue, half a block from where his mother's family lived and across the street from where the Jews of Rzeszow were assembled for their execution.

The Schippers then met with the son of the lawyer who's working on Jack Schipper's compensation claim – the son is also a lawyer.

Steven Schipper, left, is seen with Jozef Chmaj, who was a neighbour of Schipper's parents in Poland before the Holocaust.

"It's a sensitive issue in Poland," Schipper said. "If the Polish government compensated all such claims immediately, the result would be national bankruptcy. We are in the process of locating an expert witness who can testify in our support. We are hopeful that we can resolve our case satisfactorily."

Schipper said all the Poles he and Cherniack met were warm and generous. "The overwhelming sentiment is that they were victims, too," he said. "What can one say to that?"

One of their other stops in town was to visit a former neighbour of his father's family who still lives on a small plot of land that was once part of his family's land holding.

"Jozef Chmaj is one of the happiest and funniest guys I have ever met," Schipper said. "He gave us some honey from his beehives. He also grows berries and sells eggs."

Schipper said Chmaj is grateful to his family because Schipper's grandfather once provided the money to pay for surgery for Chmaj's grandmother.

The land his father's family owned, typical of landholdings in the region, was about the size of a Costco store and its parking lot, Schipper said.

Chmaj accompanied the visitors into the nearby forest where there are mass graves of thousands of Rzeszow Jews who were murdered by the Nazis. There is only a small sign pointing to the sites, which are a 10-minute walk into the forest, Schipper noted. There are three mass graves – one with 3,000 victims, the others with about 2,000 victims each. Schipper recited Kaddish at the graves.

The Schippers returned to Krakow and then visited Auschwitz-Birkenau and the former Schindler factory, now a museum that tells the story of the people of Krakow before, during and after the war.

"The time we spent in the museum was very moving," Schipper said. "The museum contains an electronic book that lists the Righteous Gentiles who saved Jewish lives during the Holocaust. It was an emotional moment to see that Franek's name was among them."

Cheese processor now under OU certification

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Bothwell Cheese, Canada's largest independently owned cheese processor, is beginning to roll out its line of Orthodox Union-certified cheeses across Canada.

"We are getting calls for potential new clients from across the country, and even a few from New York asking about the availability of our products," said Steven Gettis, the company's director of sales and marketing.

"We are very proud to have achieved this [OU] certification and thrilled about the prospects of introducing our cheese to new customers," said Ivan Balenovic, the 75-year-old processor's president and CEO, in a statement.

"We have always had exceptional factory standards, and this certification by a well-respected third party provides further verification. Many of our loyal customers have been requesting kosher cheese, and we're delighted to make it available."

Bothwell, located in the small community of New Bothwell, about 30 kilometres southeast of Winnipeg, has actually been producing kosher cheese in small quantities for special orders since the early 1980s. A mashgiach would come in as required – perhaps every second week.

However, as of the beginning of January, an OU mashgiach has been on site every day. The company wanted to sell off its remaining non-kosher cheeses that were already in the pipeline before rolling out its new kosher products, Gettis said in explaining the delay.

Bothwell Cheese produces 28 different cheese varieties, as well as cheese curds, shredded cheese and cheese powder. The company uses only fresh, locally produced milk in its products and no modified milk ingredients, fillers or preservatives. Dairy farmers still deliver their milk directly to Bothwell, one of the few remaining Canadian artisanal cheese makers that are still thriving today.

The processor has contracts to supply all the national Canadian supermarket chains with its cheeses.

"Our sales have tripled since 2001," Gettis said.

The company is particularly proud of the number of awards Bothwell Cheese has earned in recent years. The company has won first prize in the British Empire Cheese Competition for the past five years in a row for its marble cheese.

Among Bothwell's cheeses are gouda, edam, swiss, munster, cheddar, horseradish, mozzarella, red hot chili pepper, marble and jalapeno, to list a few.

Gettis noted that although most of the cheeses are now kosher, there are still three or four that are not because of their ingredients (such as the company's red wine cheese).

"We are working with the OU to source kosher alternatives for those ingredients," he said.

Geneticist says nanotechnogy will extend life

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Genetics researcher Gil Atzmon foresees a time when doctors will use existing nanotechnology to prolong life well beyond 120 years, by injecting patients with small replacement particles whenever they detect a cellular problem.

It may take 20, 30 or 40 years, he said, "but it will happen."

"From a biblical standpoint, we were designed to live to 120," Atzmon said in a telephone interview from his office at Yeshiva University (YU), where he is an associate professor at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine. "The question is how to do it."

Gil Atzmon

Average life expectancy, which is increasing by three months a year in western countries, was predicted to be 81.5 years in Canada (84 for females and 79 for males) this year.

Atzmon will be in Toronto next month for the launch of the fourth year of YU's Torah Mitzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov. He will speak next month at a program at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto, titled "The Length of Our Days: Judaism & Immortality."

He clarified that his research doesn't deal with immortality, but rather with "trying to figure out what it is that distinguishes people" who live two or even three decades beyond the average life expectancy.

Part of the answer is genetic and part is epigenetic – related to other factors, such as environment – on top of the genetic factor, he believes.

However, he added, among the centenarians he and his colleagues have studied, "30 per cent are obese or overweight. They smoke like regular people. There are more couch potatoes than mountain runners... We don't have any vegetarians. They eat meat, drink wine, they smoke and don't do exercise.

"And still they live to 100. So they probably have some genetic shield. It doesn't mean all those things that the doctor says to do won't improve your life. They will. But if you have the gene, you live longer."

The author of more than 60 scientific papers, with a PhD in population genetics from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, is trying to figure out what the shield is, he explained. "How can we develop this shield, so average people that didn't get it from their parents might have a better [long-term] survival rate?"

Among the characteristics associated with longevity are higher HDL (good cholesterol) levels and a "happy" personality, Atzmon said. However, he added, there are thousands of pieces to the puzzle. "There is no one central mechanism."

The 48-year-old native of Kibbutz Ein-Tzurim said he isn't doing anything differently in his life as a result of his research. In his favour, however, he had one grandmother and two great-grandparents who lived to 100.

In another area of research, Atzmon is studying 16 groups of Jewish people worldwide to look for a common genetic background.

Results so far have shown Jews share the same percentage of their genome, which is higher than the percentage they share with non-Jews in their part of the world.

"[But] it doesn't mean we found the Jewish gene," Atzmon said. An earlier study of his indicates that the Jewish population split geographically some 2,500 years ago, "close to the destruction of the first Temple."

As well, he added, he and his colleagues found a component of the genome indicating common roots in Israel or the Middle East. "You can see the migration of the Jewish population around the world through the genome."

The Sept. 9 program will be hosted by the BAYT's adult education committee. Torah Mitzion's rosh beit midrash Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner and sgan rosh beit midrash Rabbi Baruch Weintraub will speak on related topics. For more information, call 416-783-6960 or send an email to info@torontotorah.com.

Time to rethink chemotherapy?

Karin Kloosterman
Israel21c.org

For cancer patients undergoing treatment, the ups and downs can feel like living through one of those B-level movies where the zombies just never seem to die: victories of remission can quickly end in disappointment as the cancer returns once more.

Why this happens has long puzzled scientists around the globe, but a new multi-centre team in Israel whittles the problem down to the roots of where cancer begins.

The Israeli researchers built a unique "family tree" of leukemia cells from living cancer patients to understand more about how cancer cells divide, spread and can outlast chemotherapy treatments.

This will likely have profound implications for the way leukemia and other cancers are treated in the future, the researchers expect.

In the medical journal Blood, Israeli researchers – including Noa Chapal-Ilani, Prof. Ehud Shapiro and Dr. Rivka Adar from the Weizmann Institute of Science and Dr. Liran Shlush from the Technion-Israeli Institute of Technology – explain that tracing cancer stem cells back to where they began sheds light on how cancer reappears.

Until now there have been two main theories about why some cancers return after treatment. The Israeli study results may just put this debate to bed.

One theory is that chemotherapy can't kill each and every cancer cell. The few cancer cells left behind eventually divide out of control again, leading to a relapse. The other theory is that while chemotherapy may be good at killing run-of-the-mill cancer cells that divide rapidly, it fails to vanquish slow-dividing cancer stem cells. This second theory is supported by the evidence.

Investigating the genetics of leukemia cells with the aid of computational biology, the researchers came to a new conclusion: "We know that in many cases, chemotherapy alone is not able to cure leukemia. Our results suggest that to completely eliminate it, we must look for a treatment that will not only eliminate the rapidly dividing cells, but also target the cancer stem cells that are resistant to conventional treatment," said Shapiro.

Putting Creativity Back into School

More than ever, our world requires us to be creative in order to be successful. We often think of creativity as an inherent skill, something a person either does or does not have. Sir Ken Robinson, an internationally recognized leader in the development of education, creativity and innovation, defines creativity as "putting your imagination to work to make something new, to come up with new solutions to problems, even to think of new problems or questions."

Children are full of imagination when they begin school. But as the students grow, it is often the case that this natural talent is supressed rather than nurtured. But not all schools are overlooking this important skill.

Robbins Hebrew Academy fosters the development of a child's innate imagination. The teachers teach critical thinking and creativity as lifelong skills. Using interactive technology and active learning, students are taught to question and understand the "big ideas". By creating wonder in each child, they teach students the "applied imagination" that Sir Robinson explains.

Oraynu – A Secular Jewish School Families Love!

"My son really looks forward to Sunday mornings."

This comment is typical of the parents whose children attend Oraynu. We teach Jewish history and culture from a secular humanistic perspective, focusing on values. Children are truly engaged at Oraynu and learn through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches.

The children participate in lively, rich discussions. Family Education events, tzedakah projects, music, Hebrew, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of fun.

"My daughter feels good about being Jewish."

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is enjoyable as the children experience positive affirmations of their Jewishness in every class.

"The Bnai Mitzvah blew me away. I was so moved by the ceremony."

Imagine a Bnai Mitzvah program where students choose their own projects, based on modern Jewish heroes, ancient sages, humour, authors,anti-semitism,etc.Individual ceremonies are offered; Torah reading is optional.

If you identify as a cultural or secular Jew, humanist, agnostic or are intermarried, we welcome your family to join us.

Our school is funded with support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

THE BIALIK FAMILY IS GROWING

As we grow from one branch to two, so too does our administrative team. We are pleased to announce the appointment of Benjamin Cohen as our new Campus Principal for our Viewmount Branch. Bialik Hebrew Day School has benefitted greatly from Benjy's skills and expertise in his role as our school's Principal of General Studies over the past 6 years. Benjy will now oversee the day-to-day educational operations of our southern branch as plans for Bialik's growth on the Lebovic Campus come to fruition.

Joining our administrative team as the Director of General Studies at Bialik Viewmount is Sheldon Diamond. Sheldon brings with him many years of experience in both the public and day school systems as an educator and as an administrator, and we welcome him to the Bialik Family. If you would like to get to know Benjy or Sheldon better, we encourage you to call (416) 783-3346 to speak with or to set up a meet and greet with them.

Applying to Medical School? Law School? Dental School?

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many professional school programs, such as medicine, law, dentistry, pharmacy and business, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Since applications to professional schools have doubled in the last ten years, gaining admission requires careful planning – even for students with impressive credentials. No aspect of the application process can be overlooked.

Does someone you know need help with the university application process?

Expert advice can make the process less daunting. Whether the task is helping a student plan for eventual medical school admission, critiquing application essays for U.S. dental schools, or preparing for CASPer or Multiple Mini Interviews ("MMIs"), we work one-on-one with our clients to maximize their chances of success. The result is the strongest application possible, one that highlights each student's unique character and individual strengths.

Israel wary over Morsi's sweeping changes

Gabe Fisher and Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi's sudden firings of Cairo's military elite on Sunday has created an uncertain period for Egyptian-Israeli relations, according to a senior diplomatic source quoted on Israel Radio on Monday.

Morsi fired defence minister Mohammed Hussein Tantawi and chief of staff Sami Anan, forcing them into retirement, and cancelled the military-declared constitutional amendments that gave top generals wide powers, Egyptian state TV reported.

Morsi also ordered the retirement of the commanders of the navy, air defence and air force.

While the new military leadership is aware of the need to co-operate with Israel on security issues, it may not be aware of the "vitality" that characterized the connection between Israel Defence Forces officials and the former leaders of Egypt's defence establishment, the official said.

The source went on to say that Jerusalem is watching developments in Cairo with "great concern." Since Morsi's government doesn't communicate with Israel, little can be known of Egypt's plans, the source said.

Although the newly installed defence minister, Abdul Fatah Khalil al-Sisi, has not opened communication channels with Israel since assuming his post on Sunday, he spoke on Monday with Hamas' prime minister in Gaza, Ismail Haniyeh, who congratulated al-Sisi on his new appointment. Haniyeh reportedly pledged that Hamas would continue to maintain security and co-operation ties between Gaza and Egypt.

Earlier on Monday, a senior official in Jerusalem told Ma'ariv that the changes ordered by Morsi will not harm security collaboration between the Israeli and Egyptian armed forces.

Assuaging fears that unfamiliar military leaders in Cairo might not co-operate with Israel, the official said that defence minister Tantawi's replacement, al-Sisi, "is well acquainted with Israel's security elite – from Defence Ministry policy director, Amos Gilad, to the prime minister's special envoy, Yitzhak Molcho, and of course, Defence Minister Ehud Barak."

Gilad and Molcho met with al-Sisi during recent visits to Cairo, and al-Sisi also met IDF planning directorate chief, Maj.-Gen. Nimrod Shefer during his two visits to Egypt this summer, Ma'ariv reported.

Israel was surprised Sunday by Morsi's ouster of military strongman Tantawi, Anan and other security chiefs, and is wary of the consequences of the power play, other Israeli security sources said, following Sunday's "civilian coup."

The move cemented Morsi's authority over the armed forces in what was seen as a move similar to Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's ouster of dozens of his generals. However, Erdogan achieved control over the army in a gradual process; Morsi has done so in a matter of days.

An unnamed Israeli official was quoted on the Walla news site as saying that the immediate consequence of the shakeup was that no one in senior Egyptian military positions would now dare take any steps that they feared would not find favour with the Muslim Brotherhood president. Such a shift would inevitably adversely affect Israel, given that Tantawi and Anan were in close ongoing contact with their Israeli counterparts. The two also had long-term relations with senior American officials, including Defence Secretary Leon Panetta.

Morsi, by contrast, has not acknowledged any direct contact with Israel since his election two months ago. He sent a brief letter of thanks to President Shimon Peres last month, in response to two missives from Peres. But when the President's Office publicized the letter, Morsi's spokesman denied having sent it.

One of Israel's leading Arab affairs analyst, Ehud Yaari, described Morsi's move Sunday as a "civilian coup" against the army. The move underlined the new reality that the president and army no longer rule Egypt jointly, but rather that the army is now subject to the orders of the presidency, Yaari said.

Morsi was said on Sunday to be preparing to launch an intensified crackdown on terrorist cells in the Sinai, a week after Islamist terrorists killed 16 Egyptian security force troops at their base near the Israel border, commandeered an armoured vehicle and smashed across the border into Israel, where they were blown up by the Israel Air Force.

Israel gave Egypt permission to deploy forces in excess of limitations set out in the Israel-Egypt peace treaty in order to carry out the crackdown. "The question is, after the military operation, will Morsi take the troops back out again," said Yaari.

Political sources in Jerusalem said that if Morsi's new appointees do not co-operate with Israel, then Israel will start to take independent action to thwart terrorist attacks from Sinai, Channel 10 reported.

Boxing legend's daughter visits Israeli hospital

JTA

JERUSALEM — Rasheda Ali, the daughter of legendary boxing champion Muhammad Ali, visited Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem Aug. 9 to learn about its work in treating brain degenerative diseases.

Muhammad Ali, 70, suffers from Parkinson's disease.

Rasheda Ali toured the centre accompanied by the managers of BrainStorm, an Israeli biotechnology company developing adult stem cell therapies for neurodegenerative disorders such as Lou Gehrig's disease, multiple sclerosis and Parkinson's. She serves on BrainStorm's advisory board and is an internationally known advocate for advancing research in this area.

Ali praised Hadassah Medical Center's work in the area.

Jews seek ways to help Sikhs after shooting

Charlotte Anthony
JTA

MILWAUKEE — Almost as soon as she heard the news about a deadly shooting at a Sikh temple near Milwaukee, Elana Kahn-Oren's phone started ringing.

As director of the Jewish Community Relations Council at the Milwaukee Jewish Federation, Kahn-Oren fielded call after call from concerned area Jews asking what they could do to help.

"We have to make sure to be respectful of the Sikh community and to make sure that we find appropriate avenues to express that support," Kahn-Oren told JTA.

A day after the Aug. 5 shooting, federation was offering counselling services, had opened a mailbox to receive donations for assisting with the financial needs of the victims and their families, and was in talks with the Interfaith Conference of Greater Milwaukee to figure out a way to bring religious leaders together for an interfaith prayer service.

"Coming together after events like these reaffirms the values of the community," Kahn-Oren said. "This goes against our moral fibre."

The assailant killed six people, including the president of the Sikh Temple of Wisconsin, in Oak Creek, before being shot dead by police. On Aug. 6, police identified the shooter as Wade Michael Page, a U.S. Army veteran with ties to white supremacist groups.

Jacob Herber of Congregation Beth Israel said the Milwaukee synagogue's weekday minyan would be holding a moment of silence to commemorate and express solidarity with the victims, just as the minyan does when Jews are attacked around the world.

"Unfortunately, because we have experienced through much of our history bigotry, hatred and antisemitism, this event is very acute for us in its pain," Herber said. "That's why I think we feel not only the obligation but the real personal, profound emotion of wanting to reach out to the Sikh community."

Linda Holifield, executive director of Congregation Shalom in Milwaukee, said the shooter's targeting of a place of worship was particularly upsetting.

"When one place of worship is targeted, it suggests then that any place of worship could be a target," she said.

Tom Heinen, executive director of the Interfaith Conference of Greater Milwaukee, said the tragedy has really hit home because of the tight-knit nature of the community in Milwaukee.

"Milwaukee is in many respects a large village where many people of many faiths are interconnected personally, professionally and socially," he said. "At a time like this, we need to come together as a community to reassert our common values and to comfort those who have suffered grievous losses."

In response to the shooting, David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, issued the following statement: "We were shocked and saddened to hear of [the] attack, which authorities believe to be a horrific example of domestic terrorism. The targeting of a place of worship is a particularly heinous act for which people of all faiths should be outraged.

"We stand in solidarity with our Sikh friends and offer our condolences in this time of immense grief."

Netanyahu rebukes Ban

JTA

WASHINGTON — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu berated U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon for agreeing to attend a Non-Aligned Movement summit in Iran.

"Even if it is not your intention, your visit will grant legitimacy to a regime that is the greatest threat to world peace and security," Netanyahu's office quoted the prime minister as saying Friday in a phone conversation with the secretary general. "Not only does it threaten countries throughout the Middle East, not only is it the greatest terrorism exporter in the world, but it is impossible to exaggerate the danger it presents to Israel."

Netanyahu, who praised Ban in the phone call for his otherwise "fair" treatment of Israel, noted Iran's alleged role in recent terrorist attacks as well as its suspected nuclear weapons program.

Ban Ki-moon

Iran is set to host the next Non-Aligned Movement triennial summit on Aug. 30 and 31.

U.S. Jewish groups, including the American Jewish Committee and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, have called on Ban and other non-aligned nations not to attend.

"The government of Iran must receive a strong message from the international community, including many who have suffered directly or indirectly from Iran's support of global terrorism as well as its dangerous pursuit of nuclear weapons capacity, to publicly declare their intention not to attend," the Presidents Conference said Friday in a statement.

The movement, launched in 1961, was conceived as an umbrella for nations opting out of the Cold War between the United States and the former Soviet Union, although many of its member nations ultimately sided with the Soviets.

Since the collapse of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s, the movement has struggled to define itself.

Canada pledges $10m in aid

Baird was last in Israel in February to attend the Herzliya Conference, a major annual policy conference organized by the Institute for Policy and Strategy of the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya, a private institution for higher education.

During his current trip to the region, the foreign minister pledged $10 million in aid to various humanitarian assistance programs in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria to help with the needs of more than 150,000 Syrians who have fled their country for border states.

Israel begins military draft for haredim

JTA

TEL AVIV — The Israeli military began drafting haredi 18-year-olds without encountering significant protests one week after a new law requiring haredi military service took effect.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak on July 31 ordered the Israel Defence Forces to compose guidelines for haredi army service within 30 days, and in the meantime implemented the Military Service Law of 1986 with regard to haredim. The law requires every Jewish Israeli to serve in the IDF and includes penalties of up to three years in jail for those who don't comply.

A military source with knowledge of the issue told JTA that one week after the law's implementation, the IDF has yet to encounter any significant problems in putting haredi youths through the draft process. The 18-year-olds are undergoing competency tests in math, Hebrew and general knowledge, as would any draftee.

Previously, under legislation known as the Tal Law, haredi youths had been able to go to an IDF induction centre with a letter from a rabbi exempting them from military service so they could study in a yeshiva. The Israeli Supreme Court invalidated the Tal Law in February.

The court mandated the government to pass new legislation by Aug. 1, but no such legislation has been passed.

U.S. House considers bill on Jewish refugees

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The U.S. House of Representatives is considering a bill that would compel the administration to raise the issue of Jewish refugees in any international forum in which Palestinian refugees are discussed.

The bill, sponsored by six Democrat and Republican legislators, would also require the president to report to Congress on the "assistance the United States has provided to Israel to help it accomplish its goal that the interests of Jews displaced from Arab countries are considered in any final settlement of the Middle East refugee question."

Introduction of the bill comes after seven years of lobbying by Jews for Justice in Arab Countries (JJAC), an organization dedicated to ensuring preservation of the rights of an estimated 850,000 Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

"We've been working with Congress for many years and we are clearly happy [the bill was introduced] this way," said JJAC vice-president Sylvain Abitbol.

The bill follows on the heels of a non-binding 2008 House resolution that was adopted unanimously, said Stanley Urman, executive director of JJAC. The current bill, introduced by three Republicans and three Democrats, is "binding and has an action component," he said.

To become law, the bill must be passed by the House and Senate and receive presidential approval.

"Right now, Jewish refugees are not on the international agenda. We have been called the forgotten refugees," said Abitbol, former co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "After 1948, many Arabs from Palestine left their homes, and yes, they have been refugees. The difference is that we were never called refugees. We adapted to the places where we went, which was not the case for Arab refugees. "We Jews had been living in Arab countries for more than 2,000 years… We're talking about recognition, about justice."

According the JJAC, from 1948 to 2005, the number of Jews in 10 Arab countries dropped from 856,000 to 5,110. The majority of them settled in Israel.JJAC has long advocated that Jewish refugees be discussed in any final status negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. The government of Israel, which was cool to the issue when JJAC first raised it, now recognizes the moral imperative of raising it in talks, Urman said. Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon, who has Algerian roots, "is demonstrating tremendous leadership on this issue. It's important to him and he will raise it in talks." Last April, Israel's Foreign Ministry hosted a conference on Jewish refugees. Ayalon said compensation for Jewish refugees should be an integral part of any future negotiations or settlement.

Jews from Yemen make their way to Israel

Israel's Foreign Ministry will host another conference on the subject in September.

Israel Briefs

Bomb plot foiled

Israel foiled a massive plot to carry out a "mega-attack" or wave of several deadly terrorist attacks against Israeli targets. The Israel Police's Northern District's Border Unit and the Israel Security Agency (Shin Bet) scored a significant intelligence success by uncovering an Israeli-Arab cell smuggling weapons and explosives from Lebanon into Israel. Eleven suspects were indicted in a Nazareth court on charges of aiding the enemy in a time of war, meeting with foreign agents, possession of weapons, conspiracy to commit a crime, attempted drug smuggling and attempted drug trafficking. The cell was made up of three distinct groups, comprising 14 individuals who smuggled in 24 ready-to-use C4 high-quality bombs with attached timers into the northern border town of Ghajar, which straddles the Lebanon border.

Site identifies pilots

A pro-Palestinian website has published the names and photos of 100 Israeli air force pilots said to be in active duty. The list appears on the website of the Free Palestine Movement. It also provides dates of birth and identity numbers of the pilots. The movement's website it said received the data "anonymously" along with a statement that reads in part, the pilots "have chosen to harness their skills in the spreading of mass destruction over towns and villages throughout Gaza, the West Bank and Lebanon. State protection renders them immune." The statement urges foreign governments to prosecute the people on the list for "war crimes… The well-being of Israel is temporary and can be undermined." An IDF spokesperson said that the "publication, which is full of errors, is another attempt to undermine Israel's right to defend itself." Names and photos of air force pilots are subject to military censorship in Israel.

Lynch perpetrators arrested

Two Palestinians involved in the lynching 12 years ago of two Israeli soldiers in Ramallah have been arrested and reportedly confessed to their involvement. Marwan Maadi, 51, and Yasser Hatab, 40, were arrested in June. They were indicted last week on charges of murder in the Judea military court. The lynching took place in October 2000 at the beginning of the second Palestinian intifadah, when the two soldiers accidentally drove into the West Bank city of Ramallah. The soldiers were arrested, beaten to death and mutilated by an angry mob of Palestinians who stormed the police station where they were being held. Two other Palestinians convicted of participating in the lynching were released as part of the Gilad Schalit prisoner swap deal, according to Ha'aretz.

Ship sails for Gaza

The deputy speaker of Norway's parliament expressed his "respect" for pro-Palestinian activists sailing to Gaza. Akhtar Chaudhry met the 17 activists at Oslo's port Aug. 7, according to the website Ship to Gaza Sweden. The activists plan to reach Gaza in October in defiance of an Israeli naval blockade. "It is a fantastic way to put focus on the longstanding, illegal and brutal occupation and in later years also blockade on Gaza," Chaudhry said, according to the ship's website. Victoria Strand, a spokesperson for the group, told JTA the ship is carrying humanitarian aid. When asked about the group's positions on Hamas, Mikael Loefgren, another spokesperson, said that the ship "opposes Israel's occupation of Gaza and all human rights violations" but "does not oppose any democratically elected government in the region."

Israeli software key to Mars rover's development

'Blue and white flag' on Red Planet

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israel has yet to land an astronaut on the moon, but as of last week, there is an Israeli "flag" on Mars – because Israeli software was crucial to the development of the Curiosity rover now exploring the possibility of life on the red planet.

Curiosity is the main feature of the $2.5-billion (US) Mars ScienceLab mission. The technology and sophisticated parts that make up the rover are mainly made by American computer and aerospace companies, such as Intel, Lockheed Martin, and Alliant Techsystems. But the software that allowed NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratories (JPL) to accurately model how the Mars vehicle would perform tens of millions of miles from earth is "blue and white," developed at the Israeli branch of Siemens PLM.

No one has ever been to Mars, of course, and there have been precious few successful space missions to the planet, which have provided all the information available to date. The rover's mission is to constantly send photos and data back to earth for at least two years.

Enter PLM (Product Lifecycle Management) software, used by companies to determine how their designs and products will stand up under real-life conditions. PLM software is used in just about every manufacturing industry, and Siemens, one of the biggest providers of the software, does all its PLM work in Israel, said the company's Israeli CEO, Zvi Feuer.

"We develop PLM solutions for many of the largest companies around the world," Feuer said. "In Israel, for example, with our partner Mckit Software, we develop PLM solutions for companies like Elta, Israel Aircraft Industries, the Israel Defence Forces, Keter Plastics and many more."

One of Siemens' international customers is JPL, which is running the Mars Science Lab mission. Siemens PLM Israel helped develop the system needed to figure out how to ensure that Curiosity could stand up to the harsh conditions on Mars and continue operating in the face of the wind and dust, which appear to be a major feature of the Martian atmosphere.

"The manufacturing process generally starts with a CAD [computer-aided design] rendering of the product – in this case the rover – and usually goes on to schematics and the building of a model," Feuer told The Times of Israel.

The model is tested using PLM software and adjustments are made in the design and manufacturing process to ensure the best results. In this case, because of the prohibitive cost of building numerous models, JPL initially developed computer simulations for testing with PLM software and only later built an actual model.

The PLM software checked out all relevant systems on the Curiosity, said Feuer, including the robotic arm that digs, scoops, tests and stores samples of soil and rocks.

"We've all seen videos of this arm, and it is very complicated, with many moving parts. The arm shows just how important PLM software is – the design was very complicated and the action is very sophisticated, meaning there is a greater chance of glitches. But we cannot afford any problems, because that would be the end of the rover. You have to check anything and everything that could go wrong."

Besides the mechanics of the robot arm, Feuer added, his company's software examined other aspects of the Curiosity, including the weight it could lift, under what environmental conditions it could continue to function, and how its action algorithms work with the manufactured parts.

After months of hard work, Feuer and the team at Siemens PLM Israel were ecstatic to see the first images of Curiosity from Mars.

"This is one of mankind's greatest accomplishments," said Feuer, "and we are honored to have had a part in it."

Haredi eyeglasses blur view of 'immodest women'

JTA

JERUSALEM — Haredi men in Israel are buying glasses that will prevent them from seeing the immodest women that threaten their way of life.

The glasses, which are being sold for $32.50 (US), have a special blur-inducing sticker on their lenses that provides clear vision for up to a few metres so as not to impede movement, but anything beyond that becomes blurry – including women.

While it's not known how many have been purchased, the devices have gone on sale recently in haredi Orthodox neighbourhoods of Jerusalem and elsewhere, The Times of Israel reported.

The haredi Orthodox community's unofficial "modesty patrol" has developed a range of products to act as a first line of defence against the threat of seeing immodest women, Israeli media reported.

In an effort to maintain their strictly devout lifestyle, haredim in some neighbourhoods have separated the sexes on buses, sidewalks and other public spaces.

Murder and medicine from Toronto authors

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

With the Eaton Centre and Scarborough block party shootings in Toronto, and The Dark Knight and Sikh temple shootings in Colorado and Wisconsin, gun crimes have been screaming from the headlines all summer. Seems a perfect time, then, to look at Robert Rotenberg's third police procedural crime novel, Stray Bullets (Touchstone).

As he demonstrated in his previous books, Rotenberg has an insider's knowledge of the criminal justice system and an encyclopedic knowledge of the city of Toronto, which he puts to impressive use.

A splendid example of this occurs after defence attorney Nancy Parish clandestinely picks up her client, a suspected murderer named Larkin St. Clair, who slides into her car at an arranged intersection and talks to her from underneath a blanket in the back seat: "In a few blocks she crossed the bridge across the Don Valley and the city burst into view, the downtown office towers a forest of gleaming glass. The sunshine glistened off a gold-plated building and spangled across her windshield."

Rotenberg is also good at choosing his moments, such as when the season's first snowflakes begin to fall: that's the moment that opens the first chapter. Larkin and his pal, Dewey Booth, stake out a downtown Tim Horton's doughnut shop where Dewey's ex-girlfriend works. Dewey has just been released from jail, and he's plenty mad because Suzie's found a new boyfriend. Soon the boyfriend arrives, shooting commences, and a child is struck down by a stray bullet. The crime is soon screaming from the front page of every newspaper in town.

So who done it? See how that information is disguised in the above paragraph? Rotenberg does the same thing, and takes nearly 300 pages to give us an answer. Subsequent chapters introduce us to a stream of characters involved in the investigation and the inevitable machinations within the halls of justice: Daniel Kennicott, the first police officer on the scene; Ari Greene, the veteran homicide detective who takes the case; Ralph Armitage, the chief crown attorney who excels in making lousy backroom deals; Suzanne Howett, Booth's ex-girlfriend; the dead child's father and mother; various newspaper and television reporters, all crazed for a story, and a string of witnesses, including one who vanishes because he is an illegal immigrant.

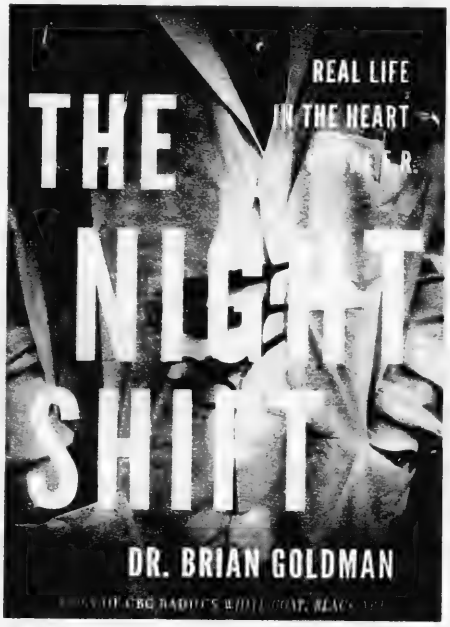
The ensemble cast is no less cosmopolitan than Toronto itself; Rotenberg scores top marks for remaking the city so recognizably in its own image. He adds sufficient background and spice to bring each character to life. He does this much better in Stray Bullets than in his previous novels, Old City Hall and The Guilty Plea. Stray Bullets is his best yet.

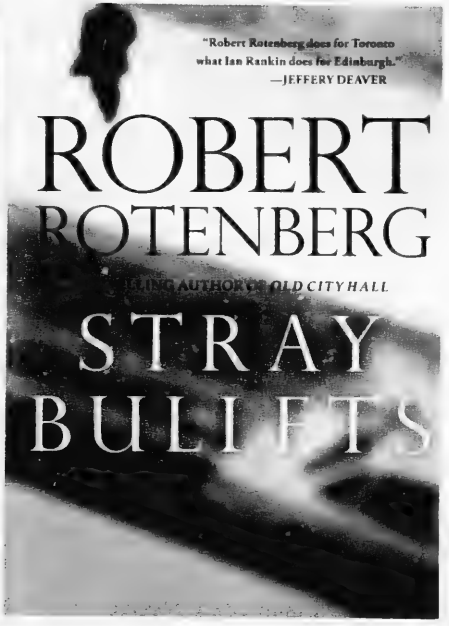
However, it still repeats the flaws of those earlier books. The chapters quick-cut from one main character and scene to the next in a never-ending rotation that can keep the reader on edge for only so long. After that, it gets monotonous. Each bite-sized chapter pushes the plot forward by a baby step or two, but a headlong rush is usually required when approaching the end of a story.

Despite the wonderful sense of "verite" present throughout, certain circumstances seem to challenge our wilfully suspended sense of disbelief. For example, is there really a downtown doughnut shop that actually has a free parking lot with vacant spots? OK, we'll let that one slide. But most people have seen TV series CSI. So why do a couple of seriously bad dudes sit down with drinks at Timmy's, leaving their prints and DNA all over the place before a premeditated shooting spree?

As in Rotenberg's previous books, Stray Bullets expertly escorts us through the labyrinthine halls of the criminal justice system, but to no good purpose. Whose life changes as a result? What moral lesson have we learned?

And why should we care about these characters?





Most are not altered by the events of the novel. Detective Greene, in particular, is inert, cool and uninvolved on an existential plane; he does not walk a moral tightrope.

Reading a Robert Rotenberg novel is like having a meal of Chinese food. It may momentarily please your taste buds, but you're hungry again in half an hour. (Published in paperback by Simon & Schuster.)

The Night Shift: The Real Heart of the E.R.*, by Dr. Brian Goldman (Harper Collins)

In this expertly written and engaging non-fiction "medical procedural," a long-established veteran of the emergency room at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital shows us behind the scenes of that scary and intimidating place, the emergency room of a large Toronto hospital.

Dr. Brian Goldman describes a stream of patients that come into his ER hour by hour over a series of simulated nights. Mount Sinai's ER has 472 beds that are usually at least 90 per cent occupied. "Pushing roughly 47,000 patients a year through the ER takes determination, efficiency, guile and some luck," he writes.

One patient, a woman named Leticia who "was about 30 and whip-thin," showed up with a mysterious abdominal pain. Kidney stone? Peritonitis, an inflammation of the abdominal lining? Playing the medical detective, Goldman conducted some quick tests, then arrived at the surprising conclusion that Leticia was pregnant and in labour. "No, it's not possible," was her first reaction, just before she was wheeled into the maternity ward. "Never assume that a woman of child-bearing potential isn't pregnant. Never," Goldman tells his students.

Mario, 84 years old, had a spell of weakness in his left arm and leg while swimming, and a stroke was suspected. While downplaying his symptoms, he also admitted he had fallen the week before. Goldman insisted on a CT scan before giving him the clot-busting drug he might have required. "Thank God we insisted on following the protocol," he wrote. "Mario, it turned out, had incurred a subdural hematoma from the fall, an injury similar to but less lethal than the one that would kill actress Natasha Richardson after a skiing accident in March 2009."

The book presents a parade of similar medical misadventures, along with teaching moments derived from each one. The author, who is the host of CBC Radio's White Coat, Black Art, writes with great knowledge and expertise, as well as honesty and humour. At its best, The Night Shift seems reminiscent of the intriguing medical mysteries that Dr. Berton Roueche used to write for The New Yorker. Many of the stories here seem nearly as gripping. (Published in paperback by HarperCollins)

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Long-running show tackled many Jewish themes

Rabbi Jason Miller
JTA

Fans of the long-running Showtime series Weeds know that writer and creator Jenji Kohan isn't afraid to pepper the show with Jewish themes. While the show has changed its flavour over the years and gained some critics, many devotees still enjoy the story about a marijuana-selling widowed mother from the suburbs and her family's experiences.

Throughout the different webs of relationships, Kohan, who is Jewish, has managed to bring esoteric Jewish concepts into the series. Perhaps because the show is on the subscription-based Showtime network (it airs on Showcase in Canada), its Jewish essence hasn't been widely covered, but Kohan, who considered attending rabbinical school but wasn't permitted to do so because she's intermarried, has taken on some controversial Jewish subjects in the past eight seasons. Here are the top Jewish references:

•Unveiling (season 1, episode 8): It's likely that many viewers thought this was a funeral service at the cemetery, but Jewish fans recognized the ritual as the unveiling of Judah Botwin's tombstone. Once the family returns from the cemetery, Nancy Botwin (Mary-Louise Parker) explains her day to the Drug Enforcement Agency agent who becomes her boyfriend: "It's where they unveil the gravestone. It's a Jewish thing. I know you're thinking, 'She doesn't look Jewish.' I come from Welsh stock... I'm not Jewish. My husband – he's dead now – he was Jewish."

Mary Louise Parker stars in Weeds. Writer and creator Jenji Kohan wasn't afraid to pepper the show with Jewish themes throughout its eight seasons.

The episode also tackles the controversial topic of Jewish lineage when the Orthodox rabbi tells the Botwin boys, Silas (Hunter Parrish) and Shane (Alexander Gould), that they are not legitimately Jewish because their mother isn't Jewish and they had never converted to Judaism.

The young Shane is hurt by the news and takes out his aggression on his wrestling opponent, whose foot he bites after yelling "Shema Yisrael!"

• Rabbinical School (season 2): Nancy's out-of-work brother-in-law Andy (Justin Kirk) decides the best way to keep from returning to military service will be to become a rabbi. He enrols in the fictional Hamidrash L'Torah rabbinical school, where he falls in love with the dean, the attractive Israeli, Yael Hoffman (Meital Dohan). While much of the ongoing rabbinical school experience is silly, some rather serious issues are discussed, including Andy's theological convictions, which come up while he is writing his admissions essay.

• Euthanasia (season 4, episodes 2 and 3): The Botwins leave the Agrestic/Majestic community after it burns and relocate to the home of Nancy's father-in-law. There they find Lenny Botwin (Albert Brooks) and his mother, Bubbie (Jo Farkas), who is hooked up to a ventilator. The Auschwitz survivor regains consciousness and asks Lenny to kill her. The Botwin men discuss the wisdom and ethics of euthanizing Bubbie, but in the end, Lenny agrees to have Nancy kill Bubbie.

•Sitting Shivah (season 4, episode 4): While shivah is one of the most well-known Jewish rituals, not many television shows have accurately portrayed it. This episode focuses entirely on the Botwin family sitting shivah for Bubbie at son Lenny's insistence. Several laws and customs of shivah are mentioned during the episode, including the understanding that family members should not cook for themselves. A shivah candle is lit, and friends and neighbours come to pay their respect.

• Levirate Marriage (ongoing): While Andy mentions the Jewish concept of a Levirate marriage to his sister-in-law Nancy at one point in the show's history, the theme is an ongoing one. The Torah dictates that an unmarried man must marry his brother's widow, but that applies only if the widow has not had children. So even if the law would not apply in Nancy and Andy's case – both because she already has children and she is not Jewish – the constant and sometimes awkward attraction between them seems continually to remind the viewer of Andy's enjoyment and frustration over the hunt.

• Bris (season 5, episode 8): Nancy gives birth to Tijuana mayor and cartel leader Esteban Reyes' baby boy, but the father (Demian Bichir) refuses to sign the birth certificate for fear of its effect on his political career. Andy signs the birth certificate as the boy's father and insists on a brit for the baby, whom he promises to raise proudly as his Jewish son. At the brit, baby Stevie is given the Hebrew name Avi Melech.

Kohan has said that she's not afraid to take on inherently Jewish concepts on the show, no matter how esoteric they may be. For the many Jewish fans of Weeds, there have been many instances of surprise and pride over the years after unpredicted mentions of a Jewish ritual or theme. As the final season comes to a close, there may just be more Jewish references to come.

Season 8, the final season, currently airing in the United States on Showtime, has not yet been scheduled by Showcase in Canada.

ASHKENAZ FESTIVAL COMING TO HARBOURFRONT AUG. 28 TO SEPT. 3

At first glance, the online schedule of the 2012 Ashkenaz Festival seems so incredibly robust and bursting with fine cultural offerings that one may be forgiven for imagining it might take place in New York rather than in Toronto.

But the ninth biennial (every second year) celebration of new Yiddish music, art and culture began right here in Toronto in 1995 and has grown into a diverse international cultural celebration that will feature more than 200 artists from more than a dozen countries this year.

The website (www.ashkenazfestival.com) shows at least 64 performances of various kinds – at least that's when I stopped counting. If you'll pardon the mixed cultural metaphor, the festival is a smorgasbord of Yiddish music, literature, theatre, film, dance, visual arts and more, including:

- Theresa Tova and a stellar ensemble present a tribute to Chava Rosenfarb, the acclaimed Yiddish writer;
- Theatre Panik presents The Corpse Bride, a darkly comic play straight out of shtetl folklore, about a young groom who accidentally weds a corpse;
- Musical performances from Israel's Yemen Blues Band, Israel and India's Shye Ben Tzur, Uganda's Abayudaya, New York's Basya Schechter, Montreal's Socalled, Russia's Opal, Winnipeg's Finjan, Mexico's Klezmerson, Argentina's Lerner Moguilevsky, Central Asia's Shashmaqam, and many more;
- Literary talks from Travellers co-founder Jerry Gray, Michael Wex with a sneak preview of his latest book about Jewish food, Paul Buhle, editor of the recent Yiddishkeit anthology of graphic tales, and others;
- Films such as Yosl Birshteyn about the Yiddish and Hebrew literary master of the same name, and Buster Keaton's Sherlock Jr., featuring a live musical score by Fern Lindzon;
- Children's performers Sharon and Bram, who add Yiddish songs alongside their classic repertoire; and much more.

Theatre Panik presents The Corpse Bride, a darkly comic play straight out of shtetl folklore.

The week-long festival runs Tuesday, Aug. 28, through Monday, Sept. 3, and includes the popular Ashkenaz Parade. Some of the events are ticketed but most are free. For more information and complete events listings, please visit harbourfrontcentre.com/summer or phone 416-973-4000. Harbourfront Centre is located at 235 Queen's Quay W., along Toronto's waterfront.

Raisman wins second gold, Kiwi sailor wins first

Compiled by CJN Staff

LONDON — Jewish-American gymnast Alexandra "Aly" Raisman won her second gold medal of the London Olympics with a first place finish in the floor exercise.

Earlier, she won a bronze medal in women's beam to go along with a gold in the women's team event.

"Today has been a dream come true," Raisman said.

"I'm so glad I got the medal I wanted. It was the best routine I've ever done. My coach said it was the best routine he'd ever seen me do.

"To have won a gold medal, two gold medals [one in the team final], is really special."

Speaking to reporters following her gold-medal performance, Raisman said she supported a moment of silence at the Olympics for the Israelis killed at the 1972 Munich Games.

"Having that floor music wasn't intentional," she said of her choice of the Jewish folk song, Havah Nagilah, for her routine.

"But the fact it was on the 40th anniversary is special, and winning the gold today means a lot to me. If there had been a moment's silence, I would have supported it and respected it."

Later last week, New Zealand Jewish sailor Jo Aleh earned a gold medal in the women's 470 regatta.

Aleh, 26 – whose parents are dual citizens of Israel and New Zealand – and partner Polly Powrie finished far ahead of the second-place British duo of Hannah Mills and Saskia Clark in the gold medal race.

Aleh, a former national champion and 2007 world champion, finished seventh at the Beijing Olympics in 2008. She's a member of Beth Shalom, a Progressive congregation in Auckland, according to New Zealand Jewish Council President Stephen Goodman.

Her father, Shuki, flew in from Israel and her mother, Daniella, who lived in Israel for eight years, arrived from New Zealand earlier this week.

Aleh has a half-sister, Shefa, and a half-brother, Yaam, in Israel. Her parents met in Israel after they completed their military service, but were married in New Zealand.

Lee Korzits, Israel's last realistic hope for a medal at the 2012 Olympics, finished ninth in the crucial medal race of her RS:X windsurfing event. Spain's Marina Alabau took the gold, with Korzits finishing sixth overall.

Her disappointing finish means Israel would end the London Olympics without a medal. Israel had won at least one medal at every summer games since Yael Arad stood on the podium in Barcelona in1992, when the judoka won the first-ever medal – a silver – for the Jewish state.

Aly Raisman

Earlier, the Israeli men's 470 tandem duo lost their chances of winning a medal. Eran Sela and Gideon Kliger were disqualified in their ninth race, and finished 15th.

The women's duo of Vered Buskila and Gili Cohen also finished 15th in the 470 tandem.

Meanwhile, Australian sprinter Steven Solomon ran out of steam in the 400 metres Olympic final.

Solomon trailed the pack and finished eighth in 45.14 seconds, his second-fastest time and just 0.17 seconds off his landmark semifinal time. The 19-year-old runner had posted two personal best times on his way to becoming the first Australian man in 24 years to qualify for a 400 metres Olympic final.

Solomon, who played soccer at the 2009 Maccabiah before taking up sprinting, said he was thrilled just to make the final.

"I'm really happy," he told Australia's Channel Nine TV. "Although I came last in the final, I got to the final. I gave it absolutely everything I had."

And he heaped praise on his Jewish Ukrainian coach, 78-year-old Fira Dvoskina, who could not travel to London but was coaching him via Skype.

"It just shows what a master she is," he said. "She can still get a 19-year-old into the final."

Also at the Olympics last week, Israeli rhythmic gymnast Neta Rivkin was in ninth place in the qualifying round after performing her hoop and ball routines.

IOC president criticized at Munich 11 memorial

Miriam Shaviv
JTA

LONDON — The president of the International Olympic Committee (IOC) came under attack from successive speakers at a London memorial for the Munich 11.

Jacques Rogge, who was in the audience during the event on Aug. 6, was blamed for refusing to allow a minute of silence during the opening ceremony of the London Games in memory of the 11 Israeli athletes and coaches who were slain by Palestinian terrorists at the 1972 Olympics.

A petition started by the families of the victims and JCC Rockland in suburban New York generated more than 111,000 signatures from across the world, but failed to move the IOC. U.S. President Barack Obama and international lawmakers also backed the minute-of-silence effort.

"Shame on you, IOC," said Ankie Spitzer, widow of fencing coach Andre Spitzer, who died in the attack. "You have forsaken the 11 members of your Olympic family. You discriminate against them only because they are Israelis and Jews."

Another of the widows, Ilana Romano, told Rogge that he had "submitted to terrorism.

"You will be written down on the pages of history as… a president who violated the Olympic charter calls for brotherhood, friendship and peace," she said at the Guildhall, a medieval-style great hall in central London. Both women received standing ovations.

The Israeli Embassy in London and the National Olympic Committee of Israel organized the memorial along with the local London Jewish community.

Members of the 2012 Israeli Olympic delegation sat on stage for the ceremonies, which were attended by more than 650 people, including representatives of various national Olympic committees. Among the many government officials in the audience were British Deputy Prime Minister Nick Clegg, opposition leader Ed Miliband, London Mayor Boris Johnson and Israeli Sports and Culture Minister Limor Livnat.

Rogge, accompanied by the only Israeli representative on the IOC, Alex Gilady, told the audience that remembering the events of 1972 was "painful" and that he "would never forget why we're here."

Pointedly avoiding referring to the Munich minute-of-silence campaign, Rogge – a member of the Belgian yachting team at the 1972 Olympics – condemned terror and said the Munich attack "cast terrorism's dark shadow on the Olympic Games. It was a direct assault on the core values of the Olympic movement."

Rogge's speech was greeted by polite applause from the audience.

Livnat said that those asking for a minute of silence were in tune with the Olympic spirit. Mick Davis, who as chairman of the Jewish Leadership Council and of the United Jewish Israel Appeal is the most senior lay leader of the British Jewish community, told Rogge that "to be silent is to be complicit… to fail to remember is to be complicit,"

Vivian Wineman, president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, Anglo-Jewry's main representative organization, told JTA that "it is good that [Rogge] should see how we feel." Meanwhile in Canada, MP Irwin Cotler wrote to Rogge urging the IOC to adopt a moment of silence in memory of the slain Israeli athletes. Cotler noted that the Parliament of Canada adopted a motion that he had presented calling for a moment of silence.

Others making the same plea include Obama, Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard, Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird, various Parliaments including resolutions by the U.S. Congress, as well as by Canadian, Australian, German, Italian and U.K. parliamentarians. The IOC, he pointed out, had held ceremonies memorializing the victims of the 2005 London train bombings and the victims of 9/11, which had no connection with the Olympic movement. The IOC had also memorialized a Georgian athlete killed in a training accident.

"The refusal of the IOC, therefore, to observe a moment of silence on the 40th anniversary of the Munich massacre – the slaughter of 11 Israeli athletes and coaches for no other reason than that they were Israelis and Jews – is as offensive as it is incomprehensible," Cotler said.

"Accordingly, it is not hard to infer… that not only were the athletes killed because they were Israeli and Jewish, but that the moment of silence is being denied them also because they are Israeli and Jewish," he added.

Acclaimed composer and arranger dies at 68

JTA

Marvin Hamlisch, the acclaimed composer and arranger of dozens of Broadway plays and films, has died at 68.

Hamlisch died Aug. 6 in Los Angeles following a brief illness.

He perhaps was best known for his work on the long-running Broadway musical A Chorus Line, which won several Tony Awards and for which Hamlisch won the Pulitzer Prize.

Along with the Pulitzer, Hamlisch earned three Academy Awards, four Emmys, a Tony, four Grammys and three Golden Globes – a rare combination of honours in the entertainment industry. Hamlisch composed more than 40 film scores, including for Sophie's Choice, Ordinary People and Take the Money and Run.

Hamlisch was born in New York to Viennese Jewish parents, and at age seven became the youngest student ever accepted into the city's prestigious Juilliard School. He started on Broadway as a rehearsal pianist and assistant vocal arranger for Funny Girl, starring Barbra Streisand, for whom he would later compose The Way We Were.

In addition to his work on Broadway musicals and movies, Hamlisch was also a conductor and led symphony orchestras across the United States, including in Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, San Diego, Seattle, Dallas and Pasadena, Calif.

Less well-known is the fact that Hamlisch's Jewish upbringing inspired much of his work and that he was dedicated to doing fundraisers for synagogues and Jewish organizations.

His parents, Austrians Lily and Max, escaped Nazism in 1935. Max jumped from a train headed to Germany, and Lily hid under a car while fleeing to Switzerland before immigrating to America.

"To my mother especially, being Jewish is sacred. She instilled my pride in being Jewish by how she lived," Hamlisch told The CJN last year.

"When the Gestapo in Vienna hauled her in for questioning, she secretly kept her Jewish star around her neck under her blouse. Despite my father's pleas that wearing a Jewish star in public was too dangerous, she never took it off her neck. She was a street fighter but always humble in her Jewishness."

Through the years, Hamlisch has done memorable fundraisers for synagogues in Toronto. In May 2011, Hamlisch was honoured at the Cantors Assembly in Toronto during Jewish Music Week.

"I wrote music for the Jewish prayer Shehechiyana to celebrate the week and was honoured by the cantors," he said. "It was very moving, and I always want to do as much as I can to keep music alive in synagogues."

BENEFIT TO CELEBRATE GUITARIST'S LIFE

Sy Benlolo

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Nina Benlolo recalls the last time she saw her brother-in-law, Sy Benlolo, a professional guitarist who was leaving for one of his routine trips to Mexico where he was booked to play a few gigs at local clubs.

"We were like, 'OK, Sy, see you later. Be safe. See you in two weeks.' And then we got a crazy call on a Friday night."

The 40-year-old musician, who had carved out a career for himself playing guitar alongside some of the worlds best-known DJs including Paul Oakenfold and Tiesto, unexpectedly died in April.

"He fell sick in Acapulco, and unfortunately he passed away from some of the medication they gave him. It gave him an anaphylactic reaction," Benlolo said.

In the four months since he died, hundreds of his friends and family have been mourning the loss of a man many described as larger than life, loving, ambitious, talented – and always flashing an infectious smile.

Marc Saltzman, Sy's cousin and close friend, said he hopes an upcoming benefit concert in his honour will help the people who loved him switch their focus from grieving a loss to celebrating a life lived to the fullest.

On Sept. 12, Saltzman, Benlolo and a number of Sy's family members and friends, will be presenting a benefit concert called Sylebration. The event, to be held at On The Rox in Vaughan, Ont., will honour Sy and his two greatest passions: music and children.

Although Sy didn't have children of his own, Benlolo said she considered him a second father to her five children.

Saltzman also saw first-hand the love his cousin had for children and treasured the bond his two boys developed with him.

"He was an amazing cousin to my little guys who adored him. Whenever Sy came over, they freaked out," he said.

"Sy's passion were kids and music," Benlolo said. "In his family, he has a disabled little girl, his cousin, and when Sy was in town, he would go and play music for her because that's what she would respond to.

"That's the kind of guy Sy was. He was the most loving guy. He always had a smile on his face, always eager to help people and he really helped her. She really responded to him."

So when Benlolo learned about the music therapy program at the Hospital for Sick Children, she knew Sy would have approved.The program enables music therapists to connect with patients and families who have difficulty coping with their situation, or have difficulty communicating via other outlets.

"It was so fitting that this is where the money would go to," she said.

Benlolo said the goal for this event is to raise $50,000, and with about a month to go until the big day, they're already 60 per cent of the way there.

"When people hear about the event, people are eager to help," she said.

"Sy was a really popular guy. I always knew he was a well-liked guy, but it was after he died that we realized how well-liked he was and how many friends he had. The attendance at his funeral was record-breaking."

Although Saltzman and Sy "grew up like brothers since we were old enough to walk," it wasn't until their early teens that they started playing music together.

They formed a rock band called Remedy. Sy, who was a diehard Kiss fan and was inspired by Kiss guitarist Ace Frehley, filled the role as Remedy's guitarist, while Saltzman played drums and managed the band. Remedy thrived for years, playing regularly at clubs. At the height of their musical careers, they opened for the Barenaked Ladies, the Tragically Hip, the Goo Goo Dolls and Our Lady Peace.

More than a decade after Remedy was founded, Saltzman decided to quit the band to pursue a career in technology.

The remaining band members went their separate ways, and although Sy tried his hand at joining the family business for a few years, he never fully gave up on his dream to become a rock star.

"In the late '90s he would frequent the club scene and he saw that DJs were becoming a crazy phenomenon," Benlolo said.

"He thought, what would make these DJs way more exciting, in his opinion, is if he could incorporate his guitar playing with the DJs," she said, adding that club owners bought into his vision and Sy was able to forge a successful career playing under his stage name, Sy Sylver.

"Nothing was rehearsed – he would just go up there and do his thing."

"He was more than a guitarist," Saltzman said. "If you've ever seen him live as Sy Sylver, he played without his shirt – he was cut. He played behind his neck... he played with his teeth. He was a showman. He was a performer.

"And when he wasn't on stage, he was taking out Nina's five kids as if they were his own."

Saltzman hopes the benefit concert next month will shine a light on a life that was cut much too short.

"I'm looking forward to raising money for a good cause in Sy's name and I'm looking forward to seeing family and friends come together, not to mourn this time, but to celebrate," Saltzman said.

The benefit concert will feature music from Remedy and Nina Benlolo's 14-year-old son, Justin, will be filling in for Sy as guitarist. The Gardens will also perform, along with DJs, female singers and percussionists Sy performed with over the years.

"I'm happy Remedy is going to be playing again," Saltzman said. "These were songs that meant something to Sy whether they're covers or originals."

The organizers of the benefit even sent a letter to the members of Kiss to ask if they would acknowledge the event in whatever way they choose, perhaps by sending in signed memorabilia for an auction, or a video greeting.

Saltzman said he hopes wherever his cousin is, he'll be at the event in spirit and realize that he did become the rock star he always wanted to be.

"Everything he accomplished from his songwriting to the impact he had on people, to the point where about 1,500 people showed up at his funeral – he didn't realize that he was already a rock star," he said.

"He did more in 40 years than most people do in a lifetime."

"תכירי, זו צביה, אמא של בעלי." טלי אומרת לי בלי להסתכל לי בעיניים, כשהיא נכנסת לבית הקפה בליווי אישה מבוגרת וקודרת. נכון, היא סיפרה לי שאמא של בעלה מגיעה לחופשה מישראל, אבל לא ידעתי שיהיה לי העונג להיפגש איתה היום, בדיוק שבוער לי לדבר על עניינים אינטימיים עם חברתי הכמעט יחידה. אוף.

טלי (לצביה): שבי, אמא, אני תיכף מביאה לך תה חם. רוצה גם עוגה? עוגייה?

אני: איזה נחמד. את קוראת לה - אמא. אני אפילו לאמא שלי לא קראתי ככה.

צביה (לטלי, בעודה מצביעה עלי באצבע מאשימה): מי זאת האשה הזאת?!

טלי: אמא, אמרתי לך שאנחנו נפגשות עם חברה שלי. לא יכולתי לבטל לה.

אני: אז מה, צביה? איך החיים שם בישראל לבד, בלי הבן שלך, בלי הנכדות?

טלי (מביטה בי בזעם): לצביה יש עוד שתי בנות ומלא נכדים. היא שמחה מאוד.

צביה (שוב מצביעה עלי): היא לא נשואה האשה הזאת, נכון?

טלי: אמא, בטח שהיא נשואה ויש לה שני ילדים, ובעלה מאוד אוהב אותה.

(ואז לוחשת לי. כשצביה מפשפשת ברוגז בתיקה) היא חושבת שכל אחת רוצה לגנוב לי את הבן שלה, שילך לעזאזל, שהכריח אותי לקחת אותה לקניות היום.

(ולצביה) אז מה אמרנו, תה עם לימון ועוגת גבינה? אשכנזי מספיק בשבילך?

צביה: אני כבר לא כועסת עלייך שאת ספרדיה. אני רק כועסת על הבן שלי, שלקח אותך. היא (שוב מצביעה עלי). מה הקטע הכפייתי הזה?) היא אשכנזיה?

אני: אז צביה, בת כמה את מותק? עדיין מותר לטוס בגילך? זה לא מסוכן כבר?

טלי (בלחץ): אמא דווקא נירארית נהדר! צעירה ויפה. מותר לה לטוס חזרה לישראל ברגע שתירצה. רק שתגיד, נעלה אותה למטוס. אפילו עכשיו. הרגע.

צביה (מדברת אלי. אלי!): את יודעת איך יודעים מתי טלי משקרת (לא מחכה לתשובה)? היא פותחת את הפה! לא מספיק לקחה לי את הילד לקנדה, לא מספיק אני רואה את הנכדות פעם בשנה, עוד היא מספרת לי שקרים על ימין ועל שמאל ומביאה חברה לפגישת קניות שלנו. ואני דווקא צריכה חזייה חדשה.

צביה: מה את מבלבלת את המוח. כל הזמן התלוננת - אמא שלי ביקורתית, קמצנית, רעה. כרגיל, את משקרת. ילדה מסכנה שכמוך. מה ייצא ממך בסוף?

טלי (להפתעתי, נופלת על זרועות צביה בדמעות): כל כך התגעגעתי אלייך!

CHOCOLATE DECADENCE

Cooking spray
1/2 c + 3 tbls sugar
1/4 c milk
1 1/2 tbls butter
2 tbls + 2 tsp unsweetened cocoa
1/2 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
8 tsp semisweet chocolate chips
5 tbls flour
1/2 tsp vanilla
1/8 tsp salt
1 lg egg white

Preheat oven to 350°. Coat 4 ramekins with cooking spray; sprinkle 3/4 tsp sugar into each, turning to coat. Set aside.

Combine 1/2 c + 2 tbls sugar, milk, and cocoa in small saucepan, stirring well with whisk. Bring to boil over medium heat. Cook 30 sec or until sugar dissolves, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; add butter and 1/2 oz. chocolate. Stir until chocolate melts and mixture is smooth. Cool mixture 10 min. Add flour, vanilla, salt, egg white to chocolate mixture, stirring whisking just until blended. Spoon 2 tbls chocolate mixture into each ramekin; top each with 2 tsp chocolate chips. Divide remaining chocolate mixture evenly among ramekins, spreading to cover chocolate chips. Bake at 350° 20 min. or until barely set. Cool 10 min. Invert onto dessert plates. Serve warm.

The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Celebrated British actor Patrick Stewart, of Star Trek: The Next Generation and X-Men fame, is to star in something completely different: Hunting Elephants, an Israeli film from director Reshef Levy.

Stewart arrived in Israel last week to begin shooting the film in which he plays an eccentric British peer who gets involved with a group of Israelis planning to rob a bank in order to save their family home. The movie also stars veteran local actors Sasson Gabbay and Moni Moshonov.

In a press conference, Stewart revealed that he visited Israel last year for four days and was left with very positive impressions.

"I told my family and friends that I wanted to come back... I am happy to be here, not as a tourist but as part of an Israeli movie production," Stewart said.

'I am happy to be here, not as a tourist but as part of an Israeli movie'

The award-winning actor, who is also known for his Shakespearean roles, told reporters that if he were the president of the United States or the prime minister of Britain, he would make the Middle East peace process his top priority. "I plan to leave Israel in a few weeks with a firmer opinion about what's going on here," Stewart said

Stewart's part was originally slated for another British legend, John Cleese of Monty Python and Fawlty Towers fame, but Cleese was forced to bow out of the role for health reasons.

"It was a great honour to be given a role that was written for John Cleese. I have to see how I can make it my own. I always wanted to be funny. Now I have a chance," said Stewart.

Hunting Elephants began shooting in July in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. It is produced by Ehud Bleiberg, who was behind the critically acclaimed comedy The Band's Visit, which also starred Gabbay.

Community 'outraged' at United Church

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish community organizations expressed outrage at the United Church of Canada's Aug. 17 decision to boycott products from Israeli settlements in the West Bank.

The boycott motion, put forward at the church's 41st General Council, which took place in Ottawa last week and ended on Aug. 19, stemmed from a report by its Working Group on Israel/Palestine Policy.

The 29-page report, released in May after two years of consultations and visits by the group's members to both Israel and the West Bank, called on the church to boycott all products made in West Bank settlements, but it stopped short of asking for a total boycott of all Israeli goods.

The United Church is Canada's largest Protestant denomination, with an estimated 525,000 members and 2.8 million adherents, according to figures from the church and Statistics Canada.

The church's Aug. 17 vote approved a final set of resolutions that included a call for church members "to avoid any and all products produced in the settlements," requests that the Canadian government ensure that "all products produced in the settlements be labelled clearly and differently from products of Israel," and requests that products produced in the settlements "not be given preferential treatment under the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement."

Other resolutions relating to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict singled out the settlements as a principal obstacle to peace in the region, called on Israel to suspend settlement expansion, and expressed regret for previously asking Palestinians to acknowledge Israel as a Jewish state as a precondition to peace.

Details of how the boycott will be applied will be determined in the coming weeks and months, church officials said.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) was furious with the church's boycott stance, as well as its expression of regret for previously calling for Palestinian recognition of Israel's Jewish character.

Kitchener Gets Eruv

KITCHENER, Ont. — The city of Kitchener, Ont., is the latest Canadian municipality to boast an eruv. The eruv was completed earlier this month under the supervision of Rabbi David Rue, head of Los Angeles' Orthodox Beit Din, and Rabbi Nevo Zuckerman, spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Congregation of Kitchener-Waterloo. The eruv is centred around the 100-year-old modern Orthodox synagogue, located in downtown Kitchener, and allows observant Jews to carry objects on Shabbat outside their homes, the synagogue said.

Columnist Dies

WINNIPEG — Samuel Segev, the Winnipeg Free Press' Mideast columnist, died earlier this month in Tel Aviv after a brief illness. He was 86. Segev wrote for the Israeli daily Ma'ariv and was a Free Press correspondent for 30 years. His weekly column began appearing in the Free Press in 2001. He was predeceased by his Winnipeg-born wife, Phyllis Sair Segev, the Free Press reported.

Embassy Targeted

WASHINGTON — Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, said Iran had targeted his embassy. Oren said last year's alleged plot to assassinate Saudi Ambassador Abel Al-Jubeir at a Washington restaurant also included plans to blow up the Israeli Embassy, WTOP radio in Washington reported Aug. 15. The complaint against Manssor Arbabsiar, who is charged in the assassination plot, also states that Arbabsiar "discussed the possibility of attacks on a number of targets... [including] government facilities associated with Saudi Arabia and with 'another' country and these targets were located within the United States." Oren said Israel was that other country.

Former Malaysian PM Slurs Jews Again

Mahathir Mohamad

KUALA LUMPUR — Ex-Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad said there is substance to allegations he made nearly a decade ago that Israel rules the world by proxy.

Mohamad wrote in his blog at chedet.cc that American presidential candidates must pledge loyalty to Israel or risk losing the election, the Malaysian national news agency Bernama reported Aug. 13.

"Mitt Romney, the Republican candidate for president, has just made the pilgrimage, and he has made a public pledge that he will be even tougher against the Palestinians and Iran than [President Barack] Obama," Mohamad wrote

He said he believes Obama will soon make this pilgrimage and make more promises to fight for Israel.

"It is not what is good for the United States which counts," Mohamad said. "One can imagine the policies that will be adopted by whichever government or president wins, and it is clear the United States cannot ignore Israel's views when reacting to anything of concern to Israel."

Mohamad, long known for his antisemitic views and avid support for the Palestinian cause, said during a summit for the Organization of the Islamic Conference in 2003 that "the Nazis killed six million Jews out of 12 million. But today the Jews rule the world by proxy. They get others to fight and die for them."

Cities Twinned

SACRAMENTO — Sacramento City Council on voted unanimously Aug. 14 to adopt Ashkelon as a sister city, resisting opposition from local boycott, divestment and sanctions advocates. In 2009, California's capital decided to twin with the Israeli city to match its existing partnership with Palestinian Authority-controlled Bethlehem. A local chapter of the pro-Israel group StandWithUs collected signatures to urge the city to stand by its pledge.

Seniors' agency plans for new challenges

Circle of Care to deal with influx of baby boomers

Michelle Bitran
Intern

The first of the baby boomers turned 65 last year. This marks the beginning of a huge population shift in Canada, with the number of seniors expected to nearly double over the next 25 years, according to Statistics Canada.

For the first time ever, seniors in the country are expected to outnumber children, and health and community services for seniors have to be prepared to cope with additional clients.

Circle of Care, a non-profit community healthcare organization dedicated to senior citizens, is ready for the challenge.

"Circle of Care... provides a smorgasbord, a full range, of community services that cover social, health and community service needs," said Michael Scheinert, one of the founders, and now the president and CEO of the organization.

Circle of Care offers a wide range of services, including providing personal support workers to help the elderly with household duties and personal care, drivers to take them to appointments or social outings, a day centre with activities for those with Alzheimer's or cognitive impairment, phone pals for isolated seniors and kosher meals delivered to the home. The organization's mission is to help older people maintain independence and live comfortably and happily in their homes.

Circle of Care was established in 1974 under the auspices of the Toronto Jewish Welfare Fund, which is now the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. It began as an organization designed specifically to assist the elderly Jewish community in the city, but quickly expanded its mandate to serve elderly people of all backgrounds.

Examining the Jewish world

From the editor's desk...

Last month in its edition of July 28, The Economist published a 12-page special report on the subject of Judaism and the Jews.

The report comprised six discrete essays on subjects the editorialists of the prestigious, London-based, weekly news magazine felt would provide a sufficiently broad overview of the condition of the Jews in the year 2012.

It was not clear why the magazine chose at this time to dedicate a special section to Judaism and the Jews.

Israel – and the Jews – are a permanent preoccupation for European media. Israel's conflict with the Palestinians seems to be the only yardstick by which the Jewish state is measured in many quarters in Europe. And, of course, by that yardstick, given the jaundiced attitudes and distorted coverage of the conflict that dominate there, Israel emerges as an ogre-like monster of giant malevolent proportions.

The six essay subjects were "Alive and well," an overview of the modern Jewish condition; "Judaism in the Diaspora"; "Judaism in Israel"; "Israeli politics"; "Ideological divisions," and "Looking ahead." There was also a small sidebar on the phenomenon of the proliferation of Chabad houses around the world called "Hospitality abroad."

Despite the inclusion of the term Judaism in the title of report, most of the reportage kept returning to the myriad ways in which Jews relate to Israel and to the myriad ways in which Israel affects the lives of the Jews of the world. This was quite evident from the very beginning of the report in which the following summary subheading appeared: "Judaism is enjoying an unexpected revival." But in the very next sentence it adds the caution: "There are deep religious and political divisions, mostly centred in Israel."

The special report was generally free of the obsessively, one-sided, hostile treatment of Israel we have come to expect from most British media. That's because a great deal of the report deals with the behaviour of Jews outside of Israel. Nevertheless, the magazine's disdain for the policies of the centre-right government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was quite evident throughout the report.

For example, in the essay on Israeli politics the writer pens a wildly generalized, unfair assessment of the Israeli government's response to current anti-Israel developments throughout the world.

"For the Israeli right and for many Jewish communal leaders in the Diaspora, an undifferentiated axis of evil (my emphasis) extends from the Iranians to the Palestinians and on to antisemitic thugs on European streets. Rising antisemitism is lumped together with growing criticism of Israeli policy and hyped by Mr. Netanyahu's government into what it calls a campaign for the 'delegitimization' of Israel."

The magazine implies that the campaign for the "delegitimization" of Israel is some cynical, opportunistic concoction by the prime minister of Israel to rally his hordes of right-wing supporters. The writer uses the phrase delegitimization in an ironic sense, placing it in quotation marks suggesting there is little truth in its use. Or that at least he or she does not believe it to be true.

In truth, of course, the campaign to delegitimize the Jewish state has been active at least from the mid-'70s when the infamous "Zionism is Racism" was passed and adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations. Even though the resolution was subsequently rescinded by the UN, it has transmogrified into the even more sinister, more dangerous poster slogan "Apartheid Israel" and spawned the equally dangerous and notorious BDS campaign that advocates the boycott of, disinvestment from and sanctions against Israel.

The first UN-authorized anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, in 2001 breathed its hateful, foul life into the free-coursing sails of the apartheid, BDS cutter.

Among the first individuals to warn against the delegitimization of Israel were human rights champions such as Harvard law professor Allan Dershowitz and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Netanyahu has every right today, many years after the term was first coined, to warn the world against this menacing threat to his country. To accuse him of pointing to an "undifferentiated axis of evil" is inaccurate and unfair. He – and the many Jewish communal leaders the magazine lumps in with him – have been quite precise in identifying those who pose the greatest threats to the existence of the Jewish state.

The Economist's special report on the condition of the Jews was a superficial skimming across a complicated surface by journalists purporting to add depth to a story. But, for them, it remained still merely only a story. Nothing more important.

A short time before The Economist's report was published, the Jewish People's Policy Institute (JPPI) – a body established by the Jewish Agency for Israel – published its annual assessment for 2011-2012. The JPPI report is not a journalistic work. It is a work of serious research by a group of individuals concerned about and dedicated to helping steer the Jewish People to a thriving future. More on the JPPI report next week.

Help us put the "Super" into Sunday on September 9th

UJA Telethons over the years

Last year, UJA telethons raised more than $4 million from 5,500 gifts. This would not have been possible without the help of our incredible volunteers. By volunteering at UJA's Super Sunday telethon, you can help us change the Jewish world, one gift at a time. This will be a special day filled with community spirit, fantastic food, and great prizes.

You may volunteer for any of the following shifts:

- 9 am – 12:30 pm
- 12:00 pm – 3:30 pm
- 3:00 pm – 6:30 pm
- 6:00 pm – 9:00 pm

Food will be served at all shifts / Kashruth observed

Visit www.ujatelethons.com to sign up to volunteer or contact Rafi Yablonsky at ryablonsky@ujafed.org or 416.631.5820 for more information.

Volunteer shifts during Super Week are also available September 10th - September 13th from 6pm - 9pm.

New clergy in and around Toronto

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Several congregations in Toronto and nearby welcomed new clergy this year.

Rabbi Catharine Clark, Congregation Or Shalom, London, Ont.

Rabbi Catharine Clark became the new rabbi at Congregation Or Shalom in London on Aug. 1. A recent graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary, she was awarded the Cyrus Adler Prize for the outstanding student entering the senior class. As a rabbinical student, she served several congregations, including Shaar Shalom Congregation in Halifax. Rabbi Clark has taught at two Camp Ramahs in the United States, and volunteered for Hazon, a Jewish sustainable food organization.

She spent four years working as a lawyer in New York before entering rabbinical school.

Rabbi Clark enjoys yoga, cooking, reading, bicycle-riding and watching baseball and football. She and her husband, Eric Robinson, have a one-year-old daughter, Naomi.

Lisa Kent, Congregation Habonim

Lisa Kent, an associate cantor at Congregation Habonim, is an honours graduate from Berklee College of Music in Boston.

She has 20 years of teaching experience in public and private schools, including Leo Baeck Day School, and is currently teaching at the Creative Preschool of East Toronto.

A founding member of the Danforth Jewish Circle, Kent has been the cantor and choir director there for 15 years. She is also a freelance service leader, officiating at Jewish life cycle events.

Lisa's husband – musician and music producer Danny Greenspoon, with whom she has two teenage sons – often accompanies her in services.

Aviva Rajsky, Congregation Habonim

Aviva Rajsky, also an associate cantor at Habonim, is – in her non-synagogue life – a jazz, country and blues singer, a pianist, composer and vocal arranger. She has led services with Rabbi Tina Grimberg at Darchei Noam and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein at the City Shul, and has been guest cantorial soloist for High Holidays at the Danforth Jewish Circle.

An alumna of the Royal Conservatory of Music, where she studied piano and music theory, Rajsky began composing original music for traditional prayers as a teenager. She is a past president of the board of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, and she and her husband, Allan Kliger, are the parents of three children.

Rabbi Rafi Lipner, Shaarei Tefillah Congregation

Rabbi Rafi Lipner, associate rabbi of Shaarei Tefillah for the past three years, is now the congregation's senior rabbi, following the retirement of Rabbi Moshe Stern this month.

The 38-year-old Toronto native has a BA in economics and a master's of education, as well as rabbinic ordination from Yeshiva University.

A graduate of Yeshivat Or Chaim, he spent 10 years teaching at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Eight years ago, he founded The House, a young adult learning centre. He will maintain his association with The House.

Rabbi Lipner and his wife, Shira, have seven children, ranging in age from 11 years to 17 months.

Cantor Charles Osborne, Temple Sinai

Cantor Charles Osborne joined Temple Sinai's cantorial team in July as senior cantor.

A native of Suffern, N.Y., Osborne has composed more than 200 choral pieces and is probably best known for his Samachti. He served most recently as spiritual leader of the Jewish Fellowship of Hemlock Farms, in Pennsylvania. Concurrently, he was on the faculty of the School of Jewish Music of Hebrew College of Boston.

An internationally recognized singer, composer and conductor, Osborne attended Hartt School of Music and the Cantors Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. He is also the founder of Kol Rinah – Boston's Jewish youth chorus.

Osborne and his wife, Kathryn, have a son and three young granddaughters.

Rabbi Chezi Zionce, Beit Rayim Synagogue

Rabbi Chezi Zionce recently became spiritual leader of Beit Rayim. The Toronto native was ordained in Israel in 1996, and has served congregations in Ann Arbor, Mich., Charleston, S.C., and Naples, Fla. He served as spiritual leader of the First Narayever Congregation from 1986 to 1998, and was Hebrew school principal at Holy Blossom Temple in the mid-1980s.

Rabbi Zionce has also served as a rabbi and Judaic teacher at Camp Ramah, and as a founder and rabbinic leader at the Downtown Jewish Day School, now the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

Recently, he has been speaking and volunteering at JACS Toronto, an organization that provides support to people in the Jewish community dealing with alcohol and drug issues.

Queen's Park 'Al-Quds' rally mostly peaceful

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A so-called "Al-Quds" rally at Queen's Park on Aug. 18 was mostly peaceful, despite the presence of Jewish protesters and Iranian expatriates who sought to counter the event's anti-Israel message.

Toronto police were on hand to separate the sides, with Israel's supporters – represented mainly by Jewish Defence League members and expatriate Iranians who favour regime change in Tehran – pitted against a collection of anti-Israel demonstrators, including rally organizers as well as anti-Zionist, Palestinian supporters and members of the haredi Neturei Karta sect.

Minor verbal spats between individuals broke out during the rally, but no arrests were made, Toronto Police said.

The annual "Al-Quds" rally is part of a larger campaign to protest what organizers call "the usurpation of the Holy Land by the Zionist regime."

The rallies, which have been held in a number of Canadian and American cities, were created by the late Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Zafar Bangash, president of the Islamic Society of Toronto and one of the demonstration's organizers, told the crowd outside the legislature that the rally had been vilified "by the Zionists and their right-wing, fascist, Islamophobic media" in the run-up to the event.

Last year's "Al-Quds" rally at Queen's Park saw anti-Israel protesters waving Hezbollah flags and calling for the Jewish state's destruction, which prompted Jewish groups to urge Queen's Park sergeant-at-arms Dennis Clark and his boss, Speaker of the Legislature Dave Levac, to cancel the permit for this year's event.

But earlier in the week, Levac refused to overrule the sergeant-at-arms' decision to allow the controversial anti-Israel rally.

Howard English, senior vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said CIJA monitored the protest "very closely," and would ask Queen's Park to investigate if there was hate speech, with an eye to banning such events in the future.

English said he met with Levac on Aug. 17 in an attempt to convince him to reverse Clark's earlier ruling.

CIJA provided both Clark and Levac with information about last year's rally, during which speakers called Israel and Zionists cancerous, barbarians, parasitic and malevolent.

In an Aug. 17 statement, Levac said the legislature grounds are there for people to exercise "their right to assemble and to freedom of speech and are not subjected to censorship by the legislative assembly, except to ensure that Canadian law and our guidelines are observed."

He added: "I have listened carefully to the concerns raised [by the Jewish community and others] and agree that we all have a duty to promote tolerance and oppose discrimination at every turn.

"However, I also have a responsibility to protect the right of citizens to assemble and exercise freedom of speech on the grounds. This demonstration will be monitored very carefully, and I will be looking to the organizers to honour their word and to ensure the event proceeds with tolerance and civility without promoting hate, discrimination or violence of any kind."

The speaker is the only one who can reverse rulings made by the sergeant-at-arms.

"We're deeply disappointed with the decision, but we respect the fact [Levac] had a great deal of difficulty in making it," English said.

"But we really don't understand why the behaviour of these same demonstrators last year, and their despicable language, was not an indication to both the speaker and the sergeant-at-arms about what kind of protest they're dealing with."

Speaking to The CJN last week, Clark said that he had met with rally organizers and told "them what they can or can't do. It has to be lawful."

However, he said, "it's important that we don't censor events, as long as they stay within the law."

Morally irrelevant

History may yet show that the encouragement of the expansion of Jewish life and Jewish communities in the West Bank in the year 2012 was a foolish policy by the government of Israel. It has diverted scarce financial resources from pressing social and other needs. It has angered large groups of Israelis who believe governmental attention to the Jewish West Bank communities has been excessive. And it has irritated, if not also partially alienated, most of Israel's major western allies as well as many well-intended Jews around the world. (Those West Bank communities, it should be noted, are referred to by experts and commentators –and most everyone else who has an opinion on Israel – as "settlements," and they say the word as if expectorating burnt ash, with brazen disdain and marked hostility.)

But history will never show what the United Church of Canada last week asserted at its 41st General Council to be the case that the expansion of Jewish life in the West Bank – i.e., the Israeli settlements there – was the principal obstacle to peace in the region. History will show that the principal obstacle to peace in the region was the deep-down, hard-core, theologically based unwillingness of most of the leaders of the Arab and Muslim world to agree that a Jewish state belonged in "their" Middle East.

History will also show that the principal obstacle to peace between Israel and the Palestinians – let alone in the region – was Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' abject refusal since 2008 to even sit with the Israeli government to talk about peace. The settlements were a convenient but effective pretext for him after the election of Benjamin Netanyahu as Israel's prime minister. But those same settlements never once prevented him from negotiating with Ehud Olmert or any other Israeli representative prior to 2008.

The pronouncement about the settlements was part of a package endorsed last week by the United Church that was inimical to Israel and far more significantly to the advancement of the very peace the church so earnestly claims to encourage.

The church also called for a boycott of products from the Israeli communities on the West Bank. This was an easy step for the church, because it was simply following others, including some Jews, who, misguidedly or malevolently, have done the same. The church also called on Israel to suspend settlement expansion. But most egregiously and most revealing of all was the official expression of regret by the church for having previously asked Palestinians to acknowledge Israel as a Jewish state.

During the very same week that the United Church decided, in effect, that there need not be, after all, one state on earth that can be Jewish, the president of Iran called Israel "a cancerous tumour" and said "the nations of the region will soon finish off the usurper Zionists in the Palestinian land."

In the circumstances of what is truly happening in the Middle East, the United Church's pronouncements were not only morally obtuse, they were morally irrelevant.

United Church boycott

I am appalled by the United Church of Canada's reckless call for consumer boycott of goods produced by Jews in West Bank and eastern part of Jerusalem. As a Jew and a son of a Holocaust survivor, I am insulted that the church is singling out the Jews.

It appears to me as a covert antisemitism to deny the existence of the undivided Jerusalem. It is unprecedented that only the Jewish People are singled out in denying their right to the historical capital of Jerusalem. There has never been such a city as east Jerusalem. In 1947, the Arabs rejected the partition of the former British Mandate of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states by the United Nations and they chose the warpath. In 1948, the Jordanians annexed the eastern part of Jerusalem and the West Bank soon after Israel declared independence. However, in June 1967, during the Six Day War, the Israel Defence Forces liberated the eastern part of Jerusalem. The holy city of Jerusalem was returned to its former undivided status, as it has been historically one city over three millenniums. The border between Israel and the future Palestinian state to be established on the West Bank should be subject to negotiations between the concerned parties, and it is not up to outsiders to impose their will.

Soon after Hitler and his Nazi cohorts ascent to power in Germany, they called for the boycott of Jewish businesses and establishments in Germany. Sadly enough, today the Jews are being singled out by a Canadian church.

Levy report requires rebuttal

The Levy report and its deliberate misrepresentation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 by its commission member, former Israeli ambassador to Canada Alan Baker, continues to dismay those of us who yearn for peace in the Middle East ("Levy report affirms Israel's rights to territory," Aug. 9).

Once again, one needs to be reminded that the official Israeli government position about the captured territories during the 1967 Six Day War really counters the policy of settlements development. In 1968, the great Israeli ambassador, Abba Eban, reiterated and affirmed Israel's acceptance of UNSCR 242 and stated that Israel would "seek agreement with each Arab state on all matters included in that resolution," one being "a just settlement of the [Palestinian] refugees problem." These refugees either fled or were expelled during the 1967 war. Did the Commission to Examine the Status of Building in Judea and Samaria, headed by Israeli Supreme Court Justice Edmund Levy, hear from eyewitness accounts, such as an Israel Defence Forces officer who refused to deport those inhabitants, as he had experienced such treatment during the Holocaust when the same acts were committed against Jews? Did the Levy commission hear about unimaginable acts that are unprintable here?

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

Meanwhile, since the 1967 war, Israel has encroached on territory that will likely be conceded under a signed peace agreement. Nevertheless, the large settlements Israel is hoping to annex constitute approximately five per cent of the captured territories in the 1967 war and contain 75 per cent of Israeli settlers. Today, settlers with ideological convictions are literally threatening the existence of the Jewish Zionist state, the Jewish community-at-large and global peace.

Israel's refusal to accept the return of the 1967 Six Day War refugees violates the Fourth Geneva Convention, to which it is a signatory. However, UNSCR 242 does not mean that every square kilometre of captured land must be returned, nor would the refugees necessarily return to Israel proper, as Israel's security, identity and sovereignty are also important.

BDS campaign still a threat, despite failures

Kenneth Stern

For more than a decade, anti-Israel activists have sought to shoehorn Israel into the nomenclature of apartheid-era South Africa through the use of a tactic named BDS (boycott, divestment, sanctions). Apartheid was a universally decried racist system. BDS activists argue that Israel is the second coming of apartheid South Africa and must be treated the same.

BDS activists may claim success, but they are certainly aware that their efforts have failed. No American university has divested from Israel. When a British academic union voted on a boycott of Israeli academics in 2007, more than 400 American university presidents jointly declared that if these Brits insisted on dividing the academic community into two groups – Israelis who should be shunned and everyone else – their U.S. institutions should be counted as Israeli, too. As University of Miami president Donna Shalala has said, "I know of no American university that would support such a boycott."

BDS proponents at best can point to isolated, near-meaningless "victories," such as the recent decision of a socially responsible investment index to remove the Caterpillar Corp. from its list. The BDSers, of course, generally ignore that the decision was based on a variety of factors (including the company's treatment of its workers), or that many other companies doing business in or with Israel are still listed on the index.

Perhaps their one "victory" was to get a single food co-op in Olympia, Wash., to remove Israeli ice cream cones, crackers, chocolate bars, baby wipes and hand sanitizers from its shelves.

Antics aside, the point of BDS is to change the way Israel is viewed, to focus the debate on whether it is a "pariah" state.

Lately, however, the BDSers seem to be a bit more candid about their motives. While still asserting that Israel is in effect wrong all the time, now they are increasingly comfortable suggesting that Israel should not have been born and this "mistake" should be undone.

Judith Butler, a philosopher and a leading scholar in feminist theory who teaches at the University of California, Berkeley, makes this point in her new book, Parting Ways: Jewishness and the Critique of Zionism, published by the prestigious Columbia University Press. Butler underscores why BDS proponents do not limit their campaign to products made in the territories.

To do so would "forget the claims of 1948, bury the right of return, [and] also accept forms of unjust majority discrimination within the present borders of Israel," she says.

In essence, the point of BDS – articulated by Butler and others – is to revert to a world without Israel, irrespective of its policies. That was the theme of the One-State Solution conference last spring at Harvard University. That is why many of the pro-BDS materials circulated during the recently failed efforts to pass divestment resolutions at three major conferences of church groups – Presbyterians, Methodists and Episcopalians – distorted Jewish history by ignoring the religious, cultural and physical connection of Jews and Judaism to the land of Israel in order to paint Jews as interlopers in a region where they have no right to be (let alone a right, like other peoples, to national self-determination in their historic homeland).

Kenneth Stern

Anti-Israel Christians recently circulated a document titled Call to Action: U.S. Response to the Kairos Palestine Document. The Palestinian document was a one-sided political and theological denunciation of Israel. The U.S. version goes a step further, promoting a belief that Jews as a people do not have "an exclusive or pre-eminent right to the Holy Land," but rather a right only "to create a vibrant Jewish culture in historic Palestine."

So while BDS has yet to have any tangible economic impact on the State of Israel, it continues to be a vehicle through which the questioning of Israel's basic right to exist is, for some, a "legitimate" issue to be raised without embarrassment. This is much more worrisome than a vote about Caterpillar stock or a co-op refusing to sell Israeli ice cream cones. BDS can change the perception of Israel by creating space for respectable people to have calm debates about the "merits" of a world without a Jewish state.

Fighting BDS, then, is not just about preventing or defeating motions and referenda. It requires paying attention to and challenging the distortions of history and language used by BDS advocates. And it requires reiteration that the two-state solution, in which Jews and Palestinians have a right to national self-expression, is the only path to sustainable peace.

Tellingly, Rebecca Vilkomerson, the executive director of Jewish Voice for Peace – a strong proponent of BDS that is, at most, agnostic on Israel's right to exist – recently appeared on an American Free Press podcast and told the host she "appreciate[d] your support." AFP is a neo-Nazi, white supremacist, Holocaust-denying group. That JVP appreciates AFP's support says it all.

United Church of Canada on Israel, boycott

Newly elected United Church of Canada Moderator Rev. Gary Paterson

On Aug. 17, the United Church of Canada at its 41st General Council adopted a resolution to boycott products made in West Bank settlements. The recommendation was brought forward by the church's Working Group on Israel/Palestine Policy in a report published in May.

"Israel's continued expansion of the settlements is the most critical reality undermining the potential for good-faith negotiations between the two peoples. As long as Israel continues to establish and expand settlements on land illegally seized or expropriated from Palestinians, to create 'facts on the ground,' then there is no incentive for Israel to either end the occupation or move from negotiation to final resolution." — The United Church of Canada's Report on Israel/Palestine Policy.

"The United Church of Canada also denounces the ongoing violence towards and promotion of hatred for residents of the occupied territories by some settlers and others." — United Church of Canada 41st General Council Working Document on Israel/Palestine Policy.

The church "acknowledge[s] with deep regret the past policy of the General Council setting preconditions towards calling on Palestinians to acknowledge Israel as a Jewish state as a prerequisite to peace."
— United Church of Canada 41st General Council Working Document on Israel/Palestine Policy.

Celebrate the Creator by celebrating Creation

As I write this, the sun throws a garnet aura over the western portion of Lake Superior. The boreal forest extends seemingly without end, peppered with rivers, waterfalls and towering granite cliffs over boundless expanse of lake. A meteor shower momentarily lights up a path across the sky.

In the northern reaches of our own Ontario, it's as though one travels backwards in time, to a primeval, rugged beauty that wants nothing of humankind, except that we do it no harm. That's why so many of us urbanites escape the cacophony and comforts of the city and head for the wilderness. Its rigours and loveliness reorient us internally, bringing us back to ourselves and to something more than ourselves. It restores the soul.

Even as I think this, I feel the weight of Jewish learning press upon me. Pirkei Avot, one of the first Jewish texts I studied, warns against precisely this admiration of nature. If a person interrupts his study of Torah to say "how beautiful is this tree" or "how beautiful is this field," a Mishnah cautions, it's as though he is mitchayev benafsho, translated frequently as "guilty of death" or, a tad more mildly, "endangering his life."

Perhaps because my teachers were New Yorkers, more comfortable in an urban jungle than in a meadow, I learned this Mishnah as a dire warning against the temptations of pantheism or worldly pleasures and the urgency of Torah study whose pressing mission could not spare a moment for anything else. Perhaps, too, the Jewish world, still reeling from the devastation of the Shoah, was overwhelmed by the impossible imperative to rebuild the destroyed centres of European Judaism.

But I don't believe our ancestors lived out this dichotomy between a life devoid of natural esthetics, on the one hand, and a hedonistic celebration of the material devoid of ethics and spirit, on the other. It's hard to imagine an agrarian people keeping religious life in quarantine from nature. And so many traditional blessings pertain to the awesomeness of the natural world. Surely the composers of these blessings were not insensitive to its overwhelming beauty. In the years since my childhood introduction to Pirkei Avot, I have encountered many interpretations of the Mishnah in question that soften, qualify and reinterpret its meaning.

You could say that in recent decades, Judaism has reclaimed a connection to the elemental pull of nature. We owe this, in part, to the growth of Jewish summer camps, with Kabbalat Shabbat in the forest or along the lake. We owe it, as well, to our connection to the Jewish homeland, and the intensity of our re-acquaintance with the land itself. And we owe it to environmentalism, a value from contemporary secular culture.

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

Several years ago, my husband and I took part in a "wolf howl" in Algonquin Park. Under the guidance of park rangers and naturalists, approximately 100 people drove caravan-style deep into the park well after sunset. We pulled our cars over to the side of the road and, as we'd been instructed, stood alongside our respective vehicles in total silence. One of the rangers let out a wolf call. We all waited quietly. From a distance, we heard the response of a wolf pack. For a half hour, the back-and-forth howls could be heard – ours, theirs. By the direction from where the howls came, we could track the movement of the wolf pack. There was something of the sacred in that encounter, with the silence of 100 people a form of worship.

As the late August sky signals the imminent end of summer, and our Jewish calendar marks the final countdown to the high holidays, I recall that our Rosh Hashanah liturgy proclaims, "Hayom harat olam" – today is the world's birthday. At the heart of the powerful pull of the wilderness is a celebration of creation. We leave behind our self-concern, if only temporarily.

We are reminded that the world is important not simply for us, but for itself, in ways that transcends us. So celebrate the world's birthday. When you Celebrate Creation, you celebrate the Creator.

Anti-circumcision rhetoric poisons Jewish minds

Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of Great Britain, is one of the most articulate exponents of contemporary Judaism. I've been openly critical of his divisive attitude to non-Orthodox Jews, but I've also learned much from the way he presents Jewish perspectives on historic events and their consequences for our people.

Rabbi Sacks maintains that "an assault on Jewish life always needs justification by the highest source of authority in the culture at any given time." In the Middle Ages, it was the Church and, therefore, it shaped anti-Judaism. After the Enlightenment, it was science, and it led to the "scientific" racist antisemitism that culminated in Nazism. Nowadays it's human rights. Therefore, "it follows that any assault on Jewish life – on Jews or Judaism or the Jewish state – must be cast in the language of human rights."

This brings him to the recent decision by a court in Cologne that declared ritual circumcision an assault on the rights of a child. The court, he writes, has "just invented a new form of blood libel perfectly designed for the 21st century."

Tragically, throughout history, some Jews have bought into the surrounding culture at the expense of their own tradition. Thus from Hellenistic times more than 2,200 years ago until today, a minority either tried to hide their own circumcision or prevent their sons from having one.

Last year's mercifully unsuccessful attempt to ban circumcision in San Francisco, the relentless efforts to abolish it in Norway, Austria, Switzerland and elsewhere in Europe, and the recent decision by the German court may cause a new wave of Jews refusing to circumcise their sons.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

Because of its commitment to tradition, coupled with memories of Germany's Nazi past, organized Jewry all over the world has been quick to react against the court decision and set out to vigorously defend the time-hallowed practice.

A committee of the Knesset invited the German ambassador to Israel to a special session to discuss the matter. Like the Conference of European Rabbis, the Israeli parliamentarians strongly condemned the decision in Cologne and urged Berlin to introduce legislation to rescind it.

Because the issue concerns Muslims even more than Jews – there are some four million Muslims in Germany and less than 200,000 Jews – a joint delegation protested against the ban and declared that "we consider this to be an affront on our basic religious and human rights."

The World Union for Progressive Judaism – which has constituents in most European countries, including several congregations and a rabbinic school in Germany – has praised the German government for its intention to introduce legislation aimed at overruling the court order. It singled out Chancellor Angela Merkel for special commendation.

Nevertheless, some Jews who'd like to call themselves progressive, including Israelis, seem to prefer the decision of the court in Cologne to the intention of the parliament in Berlin.

Not all are unaffiliated. Thus the Humanistic Jewish movement, which claims 30,000 members in some 50 congregations in the United States – and at least one in Canada – reports a growing tendency in its ranks, presumably in the guise of human rights, gender equality and opposition to "genital mutilation," to replace the traditional ritual with an alternative "welcoming" ceremony for boys and girls alike.

The debate in the media has been lively. For example, Montreal-born author and academic Bernard Avishai, who divides his time between Israel and the United States, wrote a blog about his two grandsons who each recently had a bris (brit milah) and thus, as tradition has it, entered the covenant of Abraham. He conceded that "Jewish parents, no less than gentile jurists, approach this ritual at least fascinated, at times skeptical, a little queasy, certainly pained." In the last resort, however, he's happy that his grandsons have been circumcised.

Sarah Tuttle-Singer, writing in The Times of Israel, ends the description of her son's bris: "If one day my son ends up wearing a shirt that reads "For God's Sake My Penis Was Ruined,' I will pay his therapy bills."

In a column I wrote in the Toronto Star last year commenting on the San Francisco anti-circumcision campaign, I suggested that "antisemitism not only endangers the lives of faithful Jews, but also has the insidious potential to poison the minds of its victims."

To the dismay of many of us, that potential is being increasingly realized.

Turkey and the Holocaust

Turkey performed an elaborate, potentially dangerous high-wire balancing act during much of World War II, hewing to neutrality, like Sweden, Switzerland and Portugal, in an attempt to curry favour with the Allies and the Axis powers and to protect itself.

Having lost a large chunk of its territory in World War I, when it was aligned with Germany, Turkey – the successor state of the Ottoman Empire – adopted neutrality so as not to jeopardize its sovereignty and independence. In true Realpolitik fashion, Turkey displayed skill in preserving its neutral status until almost the end of the war.

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

In October 1939, just a month into the war, Turkey signed a mutual assistance agreement with Britain and France. On the eve of Germany's 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union, with the German army occupying Greece and positioned only 60 kilometres from the Turkish border, Turkey signed a friendship treaty with Germany under which it supplied the Nazi regime with chrome, a vital ingredient in the production of weapons-grade steel

During this period, when the antagonists sought to draw Ankara into the war and a German invasion of Turkey loomed as a possibility, Istanbul became a centre of espionage and intrigue as the Holocaust inexorably unfolded.

In 1944, Joel Brand, a key member of the Aid and Rescue Committee, went to Turkey on a secret mission to save Jews trapped in Nazi-occupied Hungary. Brand, associated with a still-born scheme to barter one million Jews for 10,000 trucks to be delivered to the Nazis, was arrested in Istanbul at the behest of Britain.

With Turkey turning a blind eye, the Jewish Agency office in Istanbul helped Jewish refugees holding valid visas to use Turkish territory as a transit route to reach British-controlled Palestine, said Ertan Tezgor, Turkey's representative at the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research.

Jewish refugees who did not have visas were sent to Palestine illegally, writes Turkish scholar Eyup Erdogan.

In 1942, however, Turkey turned away the Struma, a dilapidated ship commissioned by Romanian Zionists to transport Jews to Palestine.

The Struma, filled with hundreds of refugees, was eventually towed from Istanbul through the Bosphorus to the Black Sea, where it was sunk by a Soviet submarine, resulting in the deaths of 768 passengers, one of the worst naval disasters in World War II.

Turkey's refusal to allow most of the Jews to disembark is ascribed to British pressure. Britain, in keeping with the provisions of its 1939 White Paper, was determined to uphold its policy of restricting Jewish immigration to Palestine.

"We did not want to get involved in the war, so we had to be good chess players," said Tezgor. "It was a tragic incident. We have to see it in the correct context of the times."

In other important respects, Turkey was exceedingly helpful in saving Jews threatened by Nazi oppression.

From the autumn of 1933 onward, the Turkish government of President Ismet Inonu permitted more than 200 German academics, mostly Jewish, to settle in Turkey. These Jewish refugees played a stellar role in developing Turkish universities and in designing such buildings as the ministry of defence and parliament.

In Europe, Turkish diplomats issued life-saving passports to 25,000 to 30,000 Jews of Turkish origin, noted Pinar Dost-Niyego, a historian based in Istanbul.

Approximately 12,000 of the Jews rescued by Turkey held Turkish passports and/or nationality, said Dost-Niyego, who is affiliated with the Institut Francais d'Etudes Anatoliennes and teaches a history course on World War II at Galata-Saray University.

Behic Erkin, Turkey's ambassador to France, as well as Namik Kemal Yolga, Turkey's deputy consul in Paris, were instrumental in plucking Jews from the Nazi jaws of death. And in Marseilles, the Turkish consul, Necdet Kent, also provided assistance.

On the island of Rhodes, Turkish consul Selahattin Ulkumen is credited with having saved 50 Jews, a feat that earned him recognition by Yad Vashem as a Righteous Among the Nations.

Turkish wartime diplomat Selahattin Ulkumen

Turkish diplomats in Berlin, Athens, Varna, Prague and Budapest also extended help to Jews, says Erdogan.

Corry Guttstadt, a German scholar who has explored Turkey's policy toward Jews during the Holocaust, claims that some Turkish diplomats were motivated by bribes rather than humanitarianism.

No one seems to know exactly how many Jews were saved by Turkish diplomats, the subject of a Turkish documentary, Turkish Passport.

"There are no precise figures," said Tezgor, who added that upward of 10,000 Jews owe their lives to Turkey's intervention. "That question may be answered when our archives from that era are opened."

According to Tezgor, the Turkish government, fearing German retribution, did not issue explicit orders to its embassies and consulates to extend a helping hand to Jews in distress.

But Turkish diplomats could not have acted without official permission, he said. "Ankara had to know what was happening. This could not have happened without the consent of Turkey's government."

The Turkish government, too, laid on special trains to transport some 2,000 Jews to Istanbul following a German ultimatum in 1943 to Turkey and other neutral powers to repatriate their Jewish citizens.

In August 1944, with the Red Army pushing into Bulgaria and severing land links between Turkey and the Axis powers, Turkey broke diplomatic relations with Germany. On Feb. 23, 1945, Turkey declared war on Germany.

Dost-Niyego – a Muslim whose husband is a Turkish Jew – believes that Turkey should incorporate Holocaust-related events into its educational curriculum.

"In high school, I learned next to nothing about the Holocaust," said the 33-year-old scholar, adding that contemporary Turkish high school texts virtually ignore minorities, whether Jews or Christians.

Dost-Niyego, who is currently working on a paper on a new curriculum, intends to present it to the ministry of education once it is finished.

Her interest in the Holocaust was sparked by a colleague, Sila Cehreli, a Turkish political scientist at Marmara University who specializes on the Holocaust in Poland. "She asked me to attend a conference on Holocaust education, and since then, I have been interested in the Holocaust."

Organization supports haredi youths in IDF

Helps to integrate them into Israeli society

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Sixty-four years ago, when Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion agreed to give yeshiva students military exemptions, there were only 400 studying full time in all of Israel.

Today, that number is closer to 40,000, and their continued avoidance of military duty is causing stresses in Israeli society: secular Jews believe haredi young men are getting a free ride.

A tough assessment about a difficult issue, but those are not the views of an anti-haredi secularist. Rather, it's the opinion of a consultant who works for an organization dedicated to bringing haredi youth into the Israeli military.

Mimi Kamilar, a Canadian who's lived in Israel for 25 years, serves as a consultant for Nahal Haredi, a non-governmental organization that works closely with Israel's Ministry of Defence and the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) to facilitate haredi recruitment in the army. She was in Toronto recently to meet supporters of the organization and lay the groundwork for creation of a Canadian support group.

Kamilar said Nahal Haredi has been operating for 13 years, and during that time it has helped 5,000 haredi youths serve in the IDF. Today, around 350 are part of an anti-terrorist unit called the Netzah Yehuda Battalion.

Most haredim, she said, live apart from the wider Israeli society. Haredi parents could not conceive of exposing their children to secular culture, let alone military service. Their young people are brought up to consider lengthy yeshiva study as proper and normal.

Mimi Kamilar

Nevertheless, "not everybody is cut out for that, but that's the way of the haredi world. Haredim believe that... by learning Torah they are holding up the world. If the world doesn't have Torah, it will collapse," she said.

For those who can't dedicate themselves to a life of study, Nahal Haredi offers an alternative, one that integrates them into Israeli society, provides them the military pedigree important for subsequent employment and provides an education beyond the world of Torah and Mishnah, Kamilar said.

"Nahal Haredi will create an environment within the framework of the IDF that will enable haredi boys to serve in the army while adhering 100 per cent to their religious requirements, without compromise," she said.

To accommodate them, the IDF, partnering with Nahal Haredi, ensures the food is not just kosher, but mahadrin kosher (very strict). Rabbis are available to help them study, if they choose; social workers provide counselling to help them adapt to a new and unfamiliar world; the counsellors also help them address family issues, "so their families can be proud of them and not embarrassed by them," Kamilar said.

Other adaptations include making sure no women come on base; creating a Shabbat atmosphere, and providing a respite centre in Jerusalem for those who can't or don't want to go home while on leave.

Their military duty also differs from others in the third year of service, when instead of continuing combat training, they are permitted to study toward their high school matriculation.

"The idea is to prepare them for life outside the military," Kamilar said.

In its early years, Nahal Haredi mostly dealt with troubled haredi youths, but lately more youngsters from the mainstream haredi community are enlisting, she said. It's becoming to be seen as a legitimate path for young people – at least in some quarters, she said.

Kamilar's visit to Toronto coincided with reports from Israel indicating the IDF had begun drafting haredi 18-year-olds. The move came one week after a new law requiring haredi military service took effect.

On July 31, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak ordered the IDF to compose guidelines for haredi army service within 30 days, and in the meantime implemented the Military Service Law of 1986 with regard to the haredi, JTA reported.

A haredi youth enters an Israel Defence Forces enlistment centre.

The law requires every Jewish Israeli to serve in the IDF and includes penalties of up to three years in prison for those who do not comply.

A military source with knowledge of the issue told JTA that one week after the law's implementation, the IDF has yet to encounter any significant problems in putting haredi youth through the draft process. The 18-year-olds are undergoing competency tests in math, Hebrew and general knowledge, as would any draftee.

Previously, under legislation known as the Tal Law, haredi youth would be able to go to an IDF induction centre with a letter from a rabbi exempting them from military service so they could study Jewish texts in a yeshiva. The Israeli Supreme Court invalidated the Tal Law last February.

Kamilar said the Nahal Haredi approach is best suited to bringing these young people to the army.

"I believe this is the quiet revolution that Israel needs. If you take 2,000 boys who won't or can't learn in yeshiva and give them the tremendous support, it sets them up for life. They can contribute to society and still learn Torah and still support their families."

Internship program seen as positive experience

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Participants in JVS Toronto's Kohn Summer Intern Program will be the among those who decide what the Jewish community will look like in 10 years, Michael Soberman, national director of Canada Israel Experience, said last week.

"It's a tremendous obligation on your shoulders," he told about 30 alumni of the internship program, who gathered at the Hillel Wolfond Centre last week for a networking evening with professionals in the Jewish community.

"The community needs people who are going to step up and become leaders," Soberman said, and this program is vital because it fosters leadership skills in young Jewish students. "You may not be able to appreciate the value this internship has, but when you start your careers, you will," he told the students.

The Kohn program, now in its sixth year, was created to help Jewish students have meaningful summer jobs and get an inside look at the type of work available in the Toronto Jewish community. The 10-week program places students with a Jewish organization for four days a week, with the fifth day spent alternating between volunteering in the city and hearing lectures from lay leaders.

"JVS is invested in this program because we're helping Jewish students on their career path and it helps them when they graduate," said Lisa Rae, manager of volunteer and student services at JVS Toronto.

Jessica Parker, a recent Queen's University graduate who attended the event, said the Kohn internship was "professionally helpful" for her career.

"My [internship] supervisor actually cared about teaching me and letting me try different things," she said. "The program is invested in you and in the community, and that's part of why they're doing it."

But despite overwhelmingly positive feedback from the students who take part in the program, there's speculation every year about whether the program will continue.

"It's a real challenge to get enough funding for the program," Rae said. "There are so many charities out there asking for that dollar."

The students said that in addition to helping foster their career growth, the program also had an impact on their Jewish outlook. According to an alumni survey conducted in 2010, 59 per cent of respondents said they had done something different Jewishly as a result of completing the internship, and 50 per cent had begun volunteering for a Jewish organization after their internship ended.

The organizations that host the Kohn interns agree that the initiative is valuable. "It's an amazing program," said Dan Hadad, associate director of new media and campaigns at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), who worked with a Kohn intern last summer. "It exposes the young generation to the wide range of opportunities in the Jewish community."

He said this is especially important, since many students don't realize the diverse jobs available in the Jewish community.

"There's a perception of the typical ways to fight for Israel – like through advocacy at camps and synagogues," Hadad said. "But then there are diverse portfolios within the community like Size Doesn't Matter (SDM)."

SDM is a social media campaign that advocates for Israel by focusing on Israeli culture, technology, arts and innovation rather than the conflict in the Middle East.

Many young people "who weren't relating to traditional advocacy [relate to SDM]," Hadad said. "The Jewish community needs more innovative, out of the box programs like this one."

But students won't have a chance to intern for organizations in this way if the Kohn program can't secure stable funding. "We can't say yes to every organization that wants to have a Kohn intern because of a lack of funding," Rae said.

Toronto man finds long-lost cousins

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Ben Levison, a Toronto man who spent the last six decades believing that his entire extended family had died during the Holocaust, recently discovered he has two long-lost cousins living overseas, and he now harbours the hope that he'll find more of his relatives.

Born in Frankfurt, Germany, in 1936, Levison was two years old when his father, a rabbi, was imprisoned in the Dachau concentration camp following Kristallnacht.

"The only way you could get out of Dachau at that point was if you could find a country that would accept you [as an immigrant]," said Elaine Levison, Ben's wife.

"Canada wouldn't, the States wouldn't, but China would."

With his parents and two older sisters, he escaped to China, where they lived for nine years before permanently settling in Canada.

"His father was an only child, but his mother was one of seven and her six siblings were all married with children," Elaine explained.

"They chose to remain in Germany, and as far as we knew, perished in the Holocaust. Years went by. Benny never had an aunt, uncle, grandparent, cousin, relative [besides his immediate family] whatsoever."

When Andrew Levison, Ben's son, found old family photos and a letter that his grandfather had written about 30 years ago that detailed his family's history, he decided to do some of his own research.

He said he searched on Internet ancestry websites, including Jewishgen.org, for Levisons or anyone who had a Levison attached to their family tree.

"I didn't hear anything and I kind of gave up for a bit, and about two years ago, after giving myself a year hiatus, I went back to Jewishgen and there was a posting from a guy named Andre Heidt," Andrew said, adding that he lives in France.

"I saw a posting back from him saying, 'I'm not sure,' but he gave me a bit of history, which I didn't know anything about, beyond what my grandfather left us."

He consulted the photo album and sure enough, he found pictures of the Heidt family. His grandfather didn't detail who each person in the photo was, but when Andrew scanned the photo and sent it to Heidt, he got a response that opened the door to an amazing reunion story.

"Five minutes later, I get a message from him, saying, 'Where did you get that picture? That's my father.' Immediately we got in touch with each other and started to fill in the pieces. We ended up finding out that my dad's grandfather, Leo Levisohn, had a sister, and her name was Biene. Biene was Andre's grandmother. So in essence, my grandfather and Andre's father were first cousins."

As unlikely as this discovery was, Andrew was able to make another family connection through the Internet when he found a man living in Israel with a connection to a Levison.

"I had posted messages on a number of sites and there was a name of a guy named Mario Bar Levi who was connected to a Levison.

"I had sent him three or four emails through Jewishgen and never heard back from the guy," Andrew said.

"I just figured there was no connection. He sent me an email about a year ago saying, 'My father's name was Willy Levisohn.' Again, I went back to the photos and we had a picture of a guy named Willy Levisohn. I scanned it, sent to him, and he said, 'That's my father.'"

Andrew explained that the man who connects each of them to one another was their great-grandfather, Marum Levisohn.

"Mario had a picture of him, and Andre had a picture of him, and it's pretty incredible. He died in 1903."

After making a virtual connection with his father's cousins, Andrew capitalized on an opportunity to meet Heidt while on a business trip to Paris last November.

"He didn't send me any pictures so I didn't know what he looked like, but I knew exactly who he was when I got off the train. I got off the train and he embraced me and said, 'This is the first time I've ever held a family member.' He was weeping. It was crazy," Andrew said.

"I came home on a mission to get my dad to go meet his cousins."

He said he planned a family trip that had his parents travel to Israel first to meet Bar Levi. After that, Ben and Elaine Levison travelled to France where they met with their four kids – Andrew and his siblings, Craig, Tracey and Randi.

"We got in a car, drove to Gudensberg, which is the town that connects us all – we have over 200 years of history in that town, seven generations – and we met Andre in this town of Gudensberg."

Heidt had connected with a Gudensberg native named Liseselotte Habenicht, who had spend years researching the Jews who had lived in the town before the war and wanted to help Jews reconnect with their past.

In addition to visiting Jewish historical landmarks, including a cemetery where the Levisons' ancestors were buried, Habenicht also took them to the homes where Ben's great-grandfather Marum Levisohn was born in 1828, as well as the home where Marum's children Leo, (Ben's grandfather) and Biene (Ben's great-aunt) were born.

"Being in that house, knowing that my great-grandfather lived there when he was nine years old… it's amazing. I still stay up all night thinking about it," Andrew said.

He added that he was happy that his father was able to make new connections with family he never knew he had.

"You look at Andre and my dad and you can see the resemblance… you can see they're cousins. But what was even better was to see these two – they were like long-lost brothers. They would stay up all night and talk. There was a total connection."

"It was like that with Mario, too," Elaine added.

Andrew said it's because of technology – and a lot of luck and patience – that the families have been able to connect.

"After the war, the only way to look for family, before the Internet, was through the Red Cross, or you'd get on a plane, go to the town and post flyers on posting boards. You'd come back a year later and see if anyone posted back. It was not very effective. Once the Internet came along, it changed everything," he said.

In light of the success the Levisons have had so far, they're hoping to make even more family connections.

Andrew learned that Marum was married twice and there is a man who was born out of the second marriage in England who he's recently made contact with.

"Hopefully, we'll work on another reunion and get everyone together."

Ben, who was content to let his wife and son tell his amazing reunion story, summed it up by saying, "I've been very lucky, with Andrew's help, to find family… This doesn't happen everyday."

A taste of Israel on local TV

Meir Shenhav
Special to The CJN

The metaphor of the global village is often used to describe the modern world. Physical distance is meaningless, and people can read about, spread and react to global news very rapidly.

One way to learn more about what's happening in the world is to watch TV productions from another country. Here in Canada, for example, we can watch Israeli TV from one of the most multicultural countries in the world.

Maria Vorobieva, vice-president of the Ethnic Channels Group in Toronto, said that Israeli Network TV "aims to bring to its viewers the Israeli perspective and point of view, as well as the cultural and traditional events and atmosphere from Israel. The programs, which are aired in Israel, constitute a strong and valid bonding between the viewers. They allow them to connect to their Jewish essence and heritage.

"We offer a free preview on Rogers Cable 889 from Sept. 18 to 25."

The Israeli Network TV channel, launched in 2006, is broadcast in Europe, the United States and Canada. The Canadian broadcast is provided to subscribers through Rogers and Bell Fibe TV.

The channel offers a spectrum of programs from Israel's most popular channels, and viewers receive daily news updates as well as breaking news, and entertainment including dramas, comedies, cultural programs and shows for kids and teens.

The Israeli Network also features popular Israeli sports including the national soccer league and Maccabi Tel-Aviv in Euroleague basketball.

"We reach out to the English-speaking Jewish demographic as well," Vorobieva said. "We're adding English subtitles to the Hebrew-speaking programs. We reach out to the Canadian Jewish community who care about Israel, feel connected to Israelis living abroad and would like to remain updated on the unfolding events in the Middle East."

The cast of *Savri Maranan

The channel's headquarters in Tel Aviv makes all programming decisions. The local provider, Ethnic Channels, rebroadcasts the shows and ensures that the quality of the signal is satisfactory.

Some of the programs for this season include:

• The daily news report – Comprehensive reports and commentaries about today's affairs, presented by news anchors Yonit Levi and Danny Kushmaro.

• London & Kirshenbaum – A daily talk show focusing on interesting aspects of the day's events.

• Meet the Press – Dana Weiss interviews public figures in the Israeli media.

• It's a Wonderful Country – A satire with two new comedians, Eran Zarhovitz and Roy Bar-Natan.

• A Star Is Born – A talent competition. The winner will get to record an album and receive a grant of 240,000 shekels (about $58,700 Cdn) for a year, allowing him or her to focus on music.

• Strictly Come Dancing – The new season is characterized by a varied and interesting cast, including 13 stars who will put on their dancing shoes and show us their moves.

• Uvda (Fact) – Journalist Ilana Dayan presents investigations, discoveries and news stories each week.

• Second Observation – An in-depth look at topics, events and people in the military, security, law, medicine, education, the sciences and politics in Israel and elsewhere in the world.

• Prisoners of War – Seventeen years ago, a reserve unit was sent deep into Lebanon in a secret operation against a senior terrorist. The operation failed, and during the rescue operation, three soldiers were left behind and captured. After years of negotiations behind the scenes, the boys returned home in a prisoner exchange deal. Two came back alive, one in a coffin.

• Jerusalem Mix – A drama series filmed in and around Jerusalem. The story is about a typical Jerusalem family who face a number of dilemmas but still stay together and united.

• Savri Maranan – The story of an Israeli family who demonstrate that "a Polish mother (Jewish mom)" and "Moroccan honour" are concepts that no longer apply. The series presents "his side" and "her side." The link between the two is the Kiddush and the Shabbat meal.

• Welcoming the Shabbat – Dov Elboim and a variety of guests talk about the weekly Torah portion and express their personal interpretations.

• The Jewish Home – A weekly current affairs magazine that deals with different Jewish issues.

• Daily local content – Advertisers, public service announcements and a weekly local talk show with host Gila Yeffet.

Today an eclectic roundup of handy apps that you can download. Unless noted, they are in English and work on both iPad and iPhone. All are free.

Israel HaYom English Edition

Since it debuted five years ago, Israel HaYom has leapfrogged to become the country's most popular newspaper. Like its hard-copy counterpart, this iPhone edition is free and includes news, commentary and photo galleries. [http://bit.ly/jewapp9]

Channel 2 News (iPad only)

If you prefer to watch the news rather than read it, then download the superb Channel 2 News app. Watch broadcasts live, when available. (Don't forget about the time difference.) Or choose from a huge selection of on-demand reports. Even if you don't speak Hebrew, you'll feel like you've just switched on an Israeli TV. [http://bit.ly/jewapp10]

Yeshiva World News

For a window into a different kind of news, this app draws on content geared to developments in the haredi world – although I certainly saw a mix of general news when I visited. Also, check out the "Coffee Room," where I found fascinating discussions about "Yeshivish Hipsters," people having difficulty finding shiduchim (matches), and some inspirational stories. [http://bit.ly/jewapp11]

Hebrew Date Converter

The High Holiday season is around the corner, and if you find yourself scrambling for the dates of Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur or Sukkot, download this app. You get today's Jewish date at a glance, as well as the Jewish and secular dates for all holidays during the upcoming year. [http://bit.ly/jewapp12]

Funerals: a time for reflection

The Talmud (Moed Katan 27b) teaches that it was customary in some localities to blow the shofar to announce a death in the community and to summon citizens to attend the funeral.

An additional practice that took place during a funeral was that women used to wail (Ketubot 46b).

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Today, these practices are not very common, but not too long ago, they were relevant. My mother recalls women wailing as a child in Morocco.

Why were these practices incorporated into funeral services? What is their significance?

Some say that it was a practical way to gather people to attend the funeral.

The Maavar Yabok explains that it was a way to protect the living people from the angel of death.

I believe the shofar was a wake-up call for people to realize their mistakes, to repent and to return to God.

The great Sephardi sage, the Rambam, writes in his book Mishne Torah (Laws of Repentance 3, 4) "Arise from your slumber, you who are asleep; wake up from your deep sleep, you who are fast asleep; search your deeds, repent, and remember your Creator.

"Those of you who forget the truth because of daily trivialities, indulging throughout the year in the useless things that cannot profit you nor save you, look into your souls, amend your ways and deeds.

"Let everyone give up his evil way and his bad purpose."

I believe that a funeral is a time of reflection and repentance. When someone passes away, it affects the family, the friends and the community. When the shofar is blown, the sound penetrates the hearts. It enables us to realize how vulnerable we are, how life is so fragile and how every minute counts.

Every loss is difficult. However, when someone passes away at a young age, leaving a wife and family, it's even more difficult. When someone who affected people's lives positively passes away, it's really difficult to accept. When a leader of a community passes away, it's extremely painful.

We do not know the ways of God, but through our faith, we learn that "the ways of God are righteous" (Hosea 14).

I recently lost a good friend, Rabbi Yosef Oziel, the beloved Rabbi of Hechal Shalom Sephardic Congregation in Miami, Fla. He was someone who changed people's lives and affected his community positively.

When Rabbi Shlomo Amar, chief Sephardi Rabbi of Israel, eulogized Rabbi Oziel, he said that even though Rabbi Oziel was a young man, he was able to achieve so much during his short time in this world.

Each one of us should realize that "the day is short and there is a lot to be done" (Ethics of our Fathers).

As we enter the month of Elul, approaching Rosh Hashanah, it's time to reflect and change our ways.

Yehi zichro baruch. May his memory be for a blessing.

הבלדה על הגרפיטי של ברוך ג'מילי

כל הנוסעים בדרך ירושלימה הכירו את הכתובת על קיר המשאבה הראשונה בשער הגיא "ברוך ג'מילי פלמ"ח פ"ת 1948". סקרנות של שלמה ארצי ישלי הביאה אותנו לכתוב את "הבלדה על ברוך ג'מילי" שזכה במקום הראשון בפסטיבל הזמר והפזמון של 1974("מי היה ברוך ג'מילי, מה עשה ברוך ג'מילי, איפה הוא ברוך ג'מילי?"). ואז, כשעלינו לקבל את הפרס, נעמד בקהל איש גבוה ונופח בידיו לקהל הנרגש- מסתבר שמפיקי הפסטיבל איתרו את ג'מילי והביאו אותו לבריטי האומה. למחרת התגלל מחול שדים. כשעשרות קוראים נזעמים כותבים מכתבים לעיתונים הזועמים בגנות לכלכן הקרוות ג'מילי. אמרתי לשלמה: אם היה מסתבר שהוא מת במלחמה- הוא היה הופך ליקיר האומה, אבל זה שהוא הפז לחזות- הוא הפך למלכלך קדוות מלוכלכי.... ברוך ג'מילי ליוות שיירות לירושלים הנצורה תוך סיכון רב, ותיאורי כלכלכן קדות היה עלבון ציבורי. להגדיל את עוצמת העלבון, ב 1984 מחקה בעלת הבית, תברת מקורות , את הגרפיטי במסגרת עבודות שיפוצים של הבית. ברוך ג'מילי ואיתו גם אחרים מחו לשוא על הפצע החדש.לאחרונה נוסף קול מחאה חזק וייחודי לציוץ על גדל האמבורד: סיפרה החשוב ביותר של מלחמת השחרור, יזום קניוק, שעבר את זוועות המלחמה היהיה מחיל בן שבע עשרה. טוב כך בספרי האחרון "תש"ח":

"בשנת 1955 חזרתי לביקור קיץ מאמריקה. מיילתי, פגשתי חברים. בבאב אל ואד, על קיר המשאבה הראשונה, היה כתוב באותיות גדולות "ברוך ג'מילי". מצא חן בעיני שמישהו שאיש איננו מכיר, שלחם במלחמת, ידע כבר אז את מה שיעלימו אחרי כן, עם דור הפלמ"ח לזיכרון המפקדה הלא ליחמת. ולכן כתב את שמו באותיות גדולות מול הבאים לירושלים. לפני כמה שנים מחקו את שמו. מי מחק אינני יודע. אבל בשבילי זה היה כאילו מחקו את הכותל המערבי ועשו ממנו מה שעושים עכשיו למדבר: קיר של מלון יוקרה לעשירים. היה צריך להאיר את שמו. אין לי מושג מי היה אבל הוא היה שם איתנו בימים ההם" (עמ 187). יתכן שצמקתו של קניוק, ויתכן שכאבם של רבים אחרים הביאו את המשלה ביום הצצמאות שעבר לשחזר את הגרפיטי המדוייק במקומה המקורי.

It's OK to be angry with God

Rabbi Harold S. Kushner
JNS.org

Guest Voice

Is it a sin to be angry at God?

I have been a rabbi for 50 years. For the last 30 of those years, I've been known as the author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People, a book that suggested a different understanding of God's role in all the misfortunes that occur in our world.

Between those two roles, I've had countless conversations with people who had reasons to be angry at God, some because of tragedies and disappointments in their own lives, some because of the Holocaust, some because of famines, floods or genocide in other parts of the world. I have spoken to any number of people who have stopped believing in God altogether because of all the terrible things that keep happening (it's interesting how angry people get at God for not existing), and others who still believe in Him but refuse to pray to Him.

In the opening chapters of Deuteronomy, the last of the five books of the Torah and the one we read in synagogue in the weeks before the High Holidays, Moses does something completely out of character. He expresses anger at God. He complains that God has treated him unfairly. Moses has spent his entire life, at considerable personal sacrifice, bringing the word of God to the Israelites. He has endured their complaints and their deviations from God's ways, and instead of rewarding him for his efforts, God has decreed that the people who have made his life miserable for all these years will get to live in the Promised Land and Moses himself will never even set foot in it.

Whenever I would read that surprising outburst on Moses' part, I would attribute it to his advanced age and fatigue. But a few years ago, I heard a lecture by Prof. Aviva Zornberg of Jerusalem on the subject of Moses' anger at God. She suggests that Moses did that deliberately as a way of giving the Israelites permission to vent their anger at God, which they promptly do. "God must hate us to have made us wander in this desert for 40 years. If God loved us, He would have let us remain in Egypt and sent the Egyptians into the desert."

Zornberg goes on to note that immediately after the people express their anger toward God, we find something in the Torah that we have never seen before: "Hear O Israel, the Lord is your God, the Lord alone. And you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart." We had previously been commanded to obey God, to revere and honour God, to walk in His ways, but never before to love Him. Zornberg's explanation: you cannot truly love someone with all your heart if you are afraid to be angry at them. Anger need not terminate a relationship. It need not shatter a relationship. Anger and disappointment are a part of an honest, healthy relationship.

I would like to believe that God is not offended by our righteous anger at the world's unfairness, nor does He need our flattery. We should find it reassuring that we can get angry at God because we expect so much from Him, and at the same time recognize how much we need and rely on Him.

Forgetting about 0 to 6 months

Class Act

Daniel Held

Our daughter is nearly six months old. In addition to developmental milestones such as sitting up and turning over, six months marks the age when a child is first eligible for Jewish activities. Last week we signed up for PJ Library, the gift of free children's books, and we recently started attending Tot Shabbat at our synagogue.

The wait has been too long. The dearth of Jewish activities for newborns and their parents is a missed opportunity.

A recent New York Times Magazine article highlighted Target's investment in metrics to predict pregnancy. Pregnancy and childbirth is a moment of disruption in a family's life, and Target seeks to capitalize on the change. As the article states, there are "brief periods in a person's life when old routines fall apart and buying habits are suddenly in flux. One of those moments – the moment, really — is right around the birth of a child."

Through a careful analysis of shopping trends, Target predicts pregnancy with remarkable accuracy and markets directly to those needs. The Times article tells the story of an irate father accosting a store manager for sending targeted adverting for baby merchandise to his teenage daughter. A few days later he called and said, "I had a talk with my daughter… It turns out there's been some activities in my house I haven't been completely aware of. She's due in August. I owe you an apology."

Childbirth affects not only shopping habits, but social relationships, weekly routines and communal affiliations. The final months of pregnancy and the first months after birth offer an opportunity for the Jewish community to engage and aid new parents, but current offerings are paltry.

Synagogues and rabbis facilitate brit milah and baby-naming ceremonies. While meaningful ceremonies are an important, ritualized way to welcome a baby into the world and the Jewish community, they're usually one-off events that have little carry-forward for further engagement.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto runs a "Welcome to our World" program, sending new parents a baby package that includes parenting information, coupons, etc. Since 1993, the program has celebrated more than 5,000 births. In many communities, such programs serve as on-ramps to other new family programs.

The possibilities are numerous. For expecting families, we could facilitate birthing classes and prenatal yoga in synagogues and JCCs, and for new parents, especially those on parental leave, we could run daytime programs, including new mom's and dad's groups, dinner co-ops, parenting classes, and infant lap-sit with Jewish songs and stories. These programs could flow out of brit milah and baby namings and into PJ library, Tot Shabbat and Jewish early childhood education. Offering these programs in a Jewish context not only welcomes new people in the door, but builds community among those at similar phases in life. My parents are still friendly with couples they did Lamaze with more than 30 years ago!

In the six months since our daughter was born, we've found story time at the library and a parents' group at the park. They're wonderful activities, but distant from Jewish life. Like Target, we should reach out to new families as they begin a new journey, rather than impose a six-month waiting period.

Being an observant Jew in Hollywood

Judie Jacobson
Connecticut Jewish Ledger/JNS.org

A regular on the CBS hit sitcom The Big Bang Theory – in which she plays Sheldon's friend who is not his girlfriend Amy Farrah Fowler – actress Mayim Bialik is also widely known for her lead role in the 1990s NBC sitcom Blossom, as well as for her portrayal of the young Bette Midler in Beaches. She has also appeared in Woody Allen's Don't Drink the Water and HBO's Curb Your Enthusiasm, as well as a slew of 1980s and 1990s TV series and late-night talk shows. Her recent appearances include recurring roles on Secret Life of the American Teenager and Fox's Til Death. She portrayed 1960's activist Nancy Kurshan in Chicago 8.

But, her estimable acting credits aside, Bialik's real-life role as an observant Jew also garners attention.

Born and raised in Los Angeles, Bialik received a bachelor's of science and a PhD in neuroscience from UCLA, where she also minored in Hebrew and Jewish studies. The mother of two sons, she is a certified lactation educator counsellor and is devoted to a lifestyle of attachment parenting, home schooling, natural family living, and vegan cooking. She recently released a book on holistic parenting, titled Beyond the Sling.

Bialik is also co-founder and chair of the youth branch of the Jewish Free Loan Association (Genesis) and speaks frequently on a variety of topics, including her journey to embracing traditional Jewish values. She studies Jewish texts weekly with two study partners.

Q: Tell us a bit about your Jewish background...

A: Three of my four grandparents are immigrants to this country and my mom was raised Orthodox, but left Orthodoxy when she was a teenager. My dad had a more assimilated Jewish experience. They moved from the Bronx to Long Island. My parents were not at all observant. They raised me in a Reform congregation, which actually was a very positive experience. There were some remnants of my mom's Orthodoxy, but for the most part we were a traditional Reform family.

I minored in college in Hebrew and Judaic studies. I was active in Hillel in college and when I met the rabbi there, I told him I wanted to study Yiddish. He said "Study Hebrew first and then you can study Yiddish." And I did. I studied Hebrew and I actually fell in love with Hebrew grammar and ended up doing two full years of Hebrew, then took a year of Yiddish. By then I was half way through the minor, so I added classes in history and sociology, and that's how I added Judaic studies to my minor. I've visited Israel many times. I have family that made aliyah in 1976 – my aunt and uncle and five of my cousins. They live in the West Bank. I also have family on Kibbutz Gezer. I've been to Israel about a dozen times since I was 16.

Q: Why didn't you pursue a career in neuroscience instead of returning to acting?

A: My husband and I met in college and we had our first son in grad school after we got married. We fell in love with parenting and with being parents, and specifically with me being the primary caregiver. Being a research professor just wasn't going to be compatible with that. So, the plan was that we would try to take turns teaching and sort of figure it out. And I went back to auditioning. I had never done acting as an adult and I thought, well, maybe I'll work here and there. I didn't anticipate that I'd be a regular on a TV show. But I've also been teaching neuroscience in the home school community since I got my degree.

Q: You're a major voice in parenting issues, especially what is known as "attachment parenting." Has your Jewish background informed or influenced your parenting views at all?

A: In some ways. I think that the style of attachment parenting is a very traditional kind of parenting – it's not new and trendy. If you speak to women from previous generations, you will find that things like keeping the baby close to you and breast feeding on demand – kind of intuitively wanting to be with your child – are very traditional.

Margaret Mead had written a very, very interesting analysis of a Jewish family that she observed and it sounded a lot like the style of parenting that attachment parenting is. She described women constantly rocking their babies and breastfeeding every time the baby opened its mouth. She said that perhaps the men shuckling while they've davening is to recreate all the rocking that their mothers did for them. So there is absolutely a traditional ethnic aspect to parenting the way your body was made to parent. There is an Orthodox attachment parenting community. There are definitely Jews who believe that the way God made our bodies was to give birth and to nurture that child – there are many references to things like extended breastfeeding and even co-sleeping in our heritage and in the Torah.

Q: How would you describe yourself at this point of your life Jewishly?

A: I'm supposed to say that I'm "aspiring modern Orthodox" – meaning I identify most strongly with the modern Orthodox community. That's the community I daven in. That's the community that most fits my sensibilities. The reason that I don't take that moniker on is because of my unusual work situation. I'm not able to say that I completely do it the way that I want to.

Q: It's hard to be an observant Jew in Hollywood?

A: I would say that it's close to impossible. There are Orthodox writers that I know and there are a couple of Orthodox producers. I think it's very hard being female and being in acting – largely because of the publicity and the public aspects of it that revolve around a sense of fashion.

Bialik injured in car accident

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Actress Mayim Bialik seriously injured her hand in a car accident in Los Angeles.

A car full of tourists crashed into Bialik's car on Aug. 15 in Los Angeles on Hollywood Blvd., TMZ reported.

Bialik, 36, who stars in the Big Bang Theory and was a child star in Blossom, nearly lost her left thumb in the accident, according to TMZ, which reported that the digit was almost completely severed.

Hours after the accident, Bialik Tweeted that she was "in pain but will keep all my fingers." She added that her husband was typing for her, however.

In addition being an actress, Bialik is a neuroscientist and writes about Jewish parenting.

Radio host breaches broadcasting code

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Montreal radio show host violated broadcasting industry standards with his "disparaging" remarks about the Jewish community last year, an independent regulatory body has ruled.

Benoît Dutrizac, host of the talk show Dutrizac on CHMP (98.5 FM), also misrepresented a Town of Hampstead nuisance bylaw, which was the subject of the Sept. 29, 2011, broadcast during which the comments about Jews were made, the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council (CBSC) said in its Aug. 15 decision.

Among the most egregious remarks was his describing certain chassidic Jews as "mentally ill, retards" and his encouraging listeners to disrupt Jews on the High Holidays.

The complaint against Dutrizac, a veteran broadcaster and journalist, was brought by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). CIJA said it's satisfied with the ruling.

The CBSC said Dutrizac violated the Canadian Association of Broadcasters' Code of Ethics and Equitable Portrayal Code.

On the Sept. 29 show, Dutrizac and guest Alain Pronkin, who was presented as an expert on religion, discussed a Hampstead bylaw that prohibited excessive noise on certain holidays.

They focused on the fact that the town included the Jewish holidays of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, as well as the statutory holidays, as times when residents could not use high-powered construction or gardening equipment, such as gas lawnmowers and leaf blowers, on their property.

The bylaw had been amended by the council the year earlier to extend the ban to include the three Jewish holidays. About 85 per cent of the 8,000 residents of Hampstead are Jewish.

The bylaw became news during last year's High Holidays, when one resident, who had received a warning, threatened to go the Quebec Human Rights Commission on the grounds the regulation was discriminatory against those who do not practise Judaism. A first offence could result in a $1,000 fine.

According to the CBSC ruling: "Dutrizac complained that the Jewish community was imposing [its] values on Quebec society and encouraged listeners to go make noise in Hampstead on the upcoming… [Jewish] holiday."

Dutrizac "invited" anyone passing through Hampstead on those days to "honk, make noise, fart, whatever, any noise that indicates to the Jewish community that it's not the Jewish community that leads Quebec, it's not them who are going to determine how we are going to live in Quebec… It's not true that they are going to impose their religious concepts, their religious precepts on the whole society. There are damned limits."

(Several people did drive through the town honking their horns.)

When Pronkin tried to explain that Rosh Hashanah represented the new year in the Jewish faith, Dutrizac replied: "No, no, you're in Quebec. It's Jan. 1."

Dutrizac made the insulting remarks about chassidim in connection with a 2006 headline-making incident when a chassidic congregation asked the neighbouring Parc Avenue YMCA to cover its windows when women were exercising.

CIJA complained about Dutrizac's "incendiary appeal to harass the Jewish residents of Hampstead" and "accusing the entire Jewish community of wanting to dominate Quebec."

The majority of CBSC's Quebec regional panel agreed that the host made "abusive and unduly discriminatory" remarks about Jewish people and "stereotyped" them by suggesting that they were trying to impose their will on Quebec society. There was one dissenter on this point.

Created in 1990 by Canada's private broadcasters, the CBSC administers codes that the industry has established for itself. The CBSC has nearly 750 member stations and services across the country.

After the broadcast, CIJA wrote to Louis Audet, president and CEO of Cogeco, the station's owner, outlining its concerns. When it received no response, it filed a complaint with the CBSC in November.

CIJA said in a statement that the CBSC decision should serve as a reminder to media professionals that "coverage of controversial questions does not exempt [them] from the duty of self-restraint, civility and concern for objectivity."

On Aug. 13, the Hampstead council amended the nuisance bylaw. Gas-powered lawn mowers may now be used on the holidays, as well as electric and manual ones, which were previously allowed.

According to CBSC rules, CHMP is required to announce the decision on air once during peak listening hours within three days of the decision's release, and again within seven days during the time period that Dutrizac is broadcast.

Calls to CHMP for comment were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

CIJA disappointed by church report

Members of CIJA were on hand at the General Council last week to advocate for the dismissal of the working group's report and came away feeling frustrated and disappointed.

According to CIJA, the boycott decision represents a radical shift in the United Church's policies, betrays the views of the vast majority of its members, and flies in the face of decades of constructive interfaith dialogue.

In a statement, CIJA chair David Koschitzky said the church had chosen a "morally reckless path."

"The United Church has equally dismissed the concerns of the overwhelming majority of the Canadian Jewish community [and its own members]. No mainstream Jewish organization, including Canadian Friends of Peace Now [CFPN], endorses boycott. Even the leadership of the American left-wing group J-Street has publicly condemned boycotts as counterproductive," he said.

However, the left-leaning CFPN said CIJA did not speak for it.

An Aug. 13 statement by CFPN called on CIJA to think about its own position, saying that United Church members who support the report don't "necessarily represent part of the movement to isolate and delegitimize Israel within the international community as CIJA has charged."

A July 5 letter to The CJN by Stephen Scheinberg, co-chair of CFPN, noted his organization supported the church's call for a boycott of settlement products and said CIJA was "out of line" in defending the "settlement enterprise."

"Peace Now joined the settlement boycott after the Knesset made it illegal to advocate such actions and subject to civil damages," he wrote.

CIJA said an independent survey it commissioned in partnership with a grassroots group within the United Church, Faithful Witness, revealed the extent to which the new policy is at odds with the views of the majority of the church's congregants.

CIJA's CEO, Shimon Fogel, said the survey was shared with all church clergy and with the commissioners at the General Council in an attempt to convince them the report was wrongheaded.

"The church's decision to support boycott in full knowledge of these survey results confirms the extent to which this decision was driven by narrow ideology rather than by a desire to faithfully represent the views of the membership," CIJA said in a statement.

David Koschitzky

"Support for the boycott tactic is limited to a small fringe. Tragically, the United Church of Canada chose to join that fringe, rather than listen to the nearly 100,000 families who are members of Jewish federations across Canada, and on whose behalf [we] speak. The church equally ignored some 70 Canadian rabbis of all streams and from every province, representing tens of thousands of Canadian Jewish families, who made their opposition known in writing," Koschitzky said.

In June, nine Canadian senators, all United Church members, sent a joint letter to the church's then-moderator, Mardi Tindal, warning her that a deep schism between the Jewish and Protestant communities could emerge if the church adopted the controversial boycott proposal.

Their request was rebuffed by both Tindal and the head of the church's Working Group on Israel/Palestine Policy, Rev. Bruce Gregersen.

Last week, the church chose Rev. Gary Paterson as its new moderator. Rev. Paterson, who recently went on a two-month sabbatical in Israel and the Palestinian Authority, said he is anxious to talk with Jewish leaders "about the plight of the Palestinian people in the settlements and also to recognize the legitimacy of the State of Israel.

"I think if you read the report rather than the headlines, you will see that there is a deep commitment we have always had to Israel and the Jewish people, and we recognize the existence of antisemitism and legitimate fears," Rev. Paterson told the QMI news agency.

Koschitzky said that in adopting a boycott policy, the United Church "has rejected the path of balance and has chosen to explicitly ally itself with those who formally reject the two-state solution and who deny the historical right of the Jewish people to a homeland. In so doing, they have damaged the church's standing amongst Canadians and have profoundly compromised its ability to play any constructive role in making a positive impact for peace."

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) for Holocaust Studies said it, too, was troubled to learn the proposed anti-Israel boycott had passed.

FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo said he was "saddened" and "distressed" by the decision.

"We… fear a relationship of trust and friendship is irreparably broken," he said. "I don't know if church members truly understand how utterly offensive and imbalanced this proposal is, or whether a latent antisemitism within the church is slowly coming back to life. What is certain is that the era of goodwill… is over, and that the supporters of antisemitic hatred have found a new friend."

Condemnation for the boycott decision also came from B'nai Brith Canada.

"At a time when thousands of Syrian citizens are being slaughtered, we find this obsession with the Jewish state highly suspect," CEO Frank Dimant said. "The subtext of these recommendations is that Jews cannot legitimately establish working communities in biblical Israel – this is a first step towards calling for ethnic cleansing of Jews from these areas.

"These recommendations only serve to undermine the goodwill that Jewish and Christian communities in Canada have worked tirelessly to establish and maintain. Such biased recommendations coming from United Church members who can complacently enjoy safety and security here in Canada are not only entirely ineffective in addressing the realities on the ground, but are a barrier towards future negotiations between the parties themselves."

ARZA Canada, the umbrella body of the Canadian Reform movement, also criticized the church's boycott position, calling it "unfair" and biased."

"Canadian Reform congregations have had a recent history of working together with the United Church of Canada congregations and this recent action has put the work of this inter-denominational activity in jeopardy," Les Rothschild, president of ARZA Canada, said in an Aug. 20 statement.

"ARZA Canada is particularly concerned with the part of the resolution that states the United Church has reversed its previous position and now does not require the Palestinians to acknowledge Israel as a Jewish state. We fundamentally disagree. For peace to be achieved, ARZA Canada expects all parties concerned to recognize Israel as a Jewish state."

At its 2009 General Council, the church adopted policy items that called for full Israeli withdrawal to pre-1967 lines, recognition of east Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza as occupied territories and "ending all forms of violence by the Israeli government upon the Palestinian people."

The church, however, voted down a proposal for boycott, divestment and sanctions, in part due to lobbying efforts by Canadian Jewish Congress.

PQ 'secularization' plan slammed by groups

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups have deplored Parti Québécois (PQ) leader Pauline Marois' proposal to prohibit public employees from wearing overtly religious symbols on the job, but are cautious in commenting on how the PQ's planned "charter of secularism" would directly affect Jews.

Marois pledged that if the PQ is elected Sept. 4 her government will move quickly to table legislation creating the charter, which she had indicated would override constitutional guarantees, if necessary. The charter would make state neutrality paramount.

Pauline Marois

Marois said last week that "ostentatious" religious symbols should have no place in state institutions, starting with those where government services are provided.

Headgear such as hijabs and turbans would fall into that category, while party officials have been less clear on kippot.

Marois thinks that small crosses and perhaps stars, worn "discreetly", would be permissible. She feels the crucifix is a cultural, not only religious, symbol because of Quebec's Roman Catholic heritage.

(A crucifix hangs over the speaker's seat in the National Assembly, and legislators unanimously voted to retain it during the term of the Liberal Charest government.)

The PQ has not made it clear whether this ban would extend to para-public employees in such sectors as health care and education.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, speaking on behalf of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said the organization's comments would be limited until the PQ has fully clarified its intentions.

"The Jewish community of Quebec has always vigorously and passionately defended individual rights and freedoms," said Rabbi Poupko, who called on "politicians of all parties to take very seriously their obligation to appeal to the better nature of the electorate and be voices for unity, rather than divisiveness."

If the PQ's ultimate goal is to instil an adherence to Quebec values among immigrants, Rabbi Poupko said that would be better achieved through education, rather than restrictions on dress.

The government should make clear to newcomers that values such as tolerance of differences and respect for human rights are the reason Quebec is the prosperous and secure place that it is and why people want to live here, he said.

Rabbi Poupko does not believe the great majority of Quebecers are xenophobic, and he hopes its leaders, unlike in the "reasonable accommodation" debate a few years ago, do not remain silent in the face of any such expression.

Moïse Moghrabi, Quebec chair of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, described the proposed secularism charter as "a flawed attempt to fit Quebec's pluralistic and diverse society into the PQ's own restrictive and exclusionary model for integration.

"It does not represent reasonable restriction of a particular fundamental right such as might be called for by security, identification or communication requirements."

He hopes all Quebecers will voice their disapproval to the PQ of this threat to "principles of inclusion, respect for all citizens and protection of minorities."

The sole Jewish member of the National Assembly, Liberal Lawrence Bergman of D'Arcy McGee, termed the PQ proposal "odious and shameful" and, if implemented, would "make our society all the poorer."

He said he's surprised Marois would come up with such an idea when only this spring she supported Bergman's motion commemorating the 180th anniversary of the groundbreaking political emancipation of Jews through an act of Quebec's legislature.

"Obviously, she wasn't paying too much attention to the message of that motion," he said.

He doesn't believe the proposed charter is comparable to Bill 94, which was introduced by the Charest government two years ago. That legislation would have banned both public employees and those seeking public services from wearing full face coverings.

Bergman said the thrust of that bill was that faces should be shown for purposes of "identification and security."

"The Liberal Party is committed to an open secularism… Civil servants can wear any religious symbol or headgear."

Bill 94 stalled after a public commission held hearings on it.

Someone keenly watching this latest chapter in Quebec's "identity" question is lawyer Adam Atlas. He was chair of Quebec Jewish Congress at the height of the debate on the place of religion in the public sphere.

Atlas, who no longer has any official position in the community, is disheartened to see Quebec once again being "dragged backward by politicians pandering for votes" by playing on francophone Quebecers' insecurity.

This time, he finds it especially troubling because Marois is openly making a distinction between a Christian tradition and everyone else. Atlas said this establishes "two classes of citizens, which inevitably will create tensions between groups and we already have enough of that."

Prohibiting public employees from wearing religious clothing or symbols is "an affront to our fundamental freedoms.

"It's absurd, almost comical. Such wear does not disturb the peace or interfere with the normal operation of the state… Who really is offended if the employee serving me is wearing a turban? Who is the government to tell me I must be offended?"

Terror threat an election issue

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In a guide prepared for candidates in the Quebec election, B'nai Brith Canada warns that pro-Hezbollah activity appears to be increasing in the province and the government should provide funding for the security of "at-risk" communities.

The charging in July of a Quebecer with supporting terrorism for her alleged involvement in smuggling weapons to Hezbollah in Lebanon is the latest evidence that authorities here must be more vigilant about Islamic extremism, according to B'nai Brith.

The organization recommends that whichever party takes power Sept. 4 should "combat the potential radicalization of Quebecers, through ongoing monitoring and screening of extremist elements and the movement of funds abroad."

It also urges Quebec to institute a program similar to the federal Security Infrastructure Program, which provides grants to community institutions to improve their security.

While some Montreal-area synagogues and schools have benefited from the initiative, B'nai Brith points out that the federal program requires matching funds, and a few smaller institutions don't have such resources.

Centre hosts exhibit on Jewish internees

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A couple of years ago, the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre was approached by the children of Jewish men who were interned in Canada between 1940 and 1943. They came with fragments of stories told to them by their parents, declaring unanimously that these stories needed to be aired in public.

Many of their fathers had gone on to do great things in Canada. Two were Nobel laureates, one was a member of the Order of Canada and another was among Painters Eleven, a group of Canadian artists. There were university professors, architects, designers and men who achieved prominence in their respective careers. Their internment in Canada during the war years was a secret part of their lives that few had knowledge of.

In June 2012, after 18 months of intensive research and many hours of interviews with surviving internees, VHEC launched Enemy Aliens, an exhibit about the internment of Jewish refugees in Canada between those years.

"People are so surprised by this part of Canadian history that they don't know," said Nina Krieger, executive director of VHEC and curator of the exhibition. "This is our most ambitious project to date, and we feel so lucky to have amazing documents and photographs of internees, precious primary resources that have been entrusted to us."

Between 1940 and 1943, Canada's internment camps in Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick were filled with more than 2,000 male Jewish internees from Germany and Austria. Shipped from the United Kingdom to Canada and Australia, they were a mix of intellectuals, political activists, teenagers and yeshiva boys who were thrown together in the confusion of war.

Britain had initially thought them to be "fifth columnists" who wanted to subvert the regime, but realized later the group they had comprised mostly civilians. This information was slow to reach Canada, however, and when the internees arrived, they were treated as dangerous prisoners of war and guarded behind barbed wire fences for most of their stay.

Using videos of first-person testimony of the 14 surviving internees who live across the country, Krieger and her team of researchers attempted to answer questions about the circumstances that brought them to Canada, and their experience in this country. "We're mindful of how fortunate we were to capture those interviews," she said, adding that three of the interviewees died before the exhibit launched.

The video testimonies add compelling immediacy to the rest of the exhibit, which consists of photographs, documents and explanatory panels describing life in the camps. In one video, internees describe the enemy's welcome they received on arrival. Many had their belongings confiscated and stolen by Canadian soldiers, who pointed machine guns at them, thinking they were terrorists disguised as teens and religious Jews. "We were marched through town while the local population spat and cursed at us," another recalled.

Nina Krieger

In the camps, this group of diversely talented individuals created a unique society that included religious worship, arts, culture, theatre, music, newspapers, education and a forum for learning and exchange. By distracting themselves with entertainment and learning, camp internees kept their spirits from plummeting. They were also able to upgrade their interrupted schooling to the point that many could write McGill University matriculation exams, a precursor to their application to Canadian universities.

Life in the camps was full of challenges, from ensuring food was kosher and observing the Day of Atonement to dealing with sexuality in an all-male camp.

The 44 artifacts on display bear evidence of some of the activity that occurred in the camp. There are diaries and paintings, including a small watercolour painting by Oscar Cahen, who became a member of Painters Eleven. The suitcase that Peter Oberlander brought from England to Canada is on display, as is a permission slip signed by the commandant of a camp in Sherbrooke, Que., giving an internee permission to sketch within the compound. Other identity documents refer to internees as "Jews," "refugees" and "enemy aliens," classifications that during that time served as instruments of oppression.

Enemy Aliens paints a clear picture of a Canada that was hostile toward and did not want to accept Jews. It's a Canada that looked very different from the society we know today, and as you peruse the exhibition, you cannot help but feel grateful for the atmosphere of acceptance that exists in this country 70 years later.

After 1943, as the internees were released into Canadian society, a public relations campaign was launched to stem any backlash against them. The internees were presented as people with unique stories about their experiences, rather than as a group who might be usurping jobs from Canadians. In this way, the Central Committee for Interned Refugees successfully campaigned for the internees to be allowed to stay in Canada, as opposed to being extradited back to the United Kingdom.

Enemy Aliens was made possible in part as a result of funding from the Community Historical Recognition Program, which is part of the Citizenship and Multiculturalism Branch of Citizenship and Immigration Canada. It's too late to recover the three years of internment that were lost to these internees, but not too late to achieve perspective, through Enemy Aliens, of what life was like for Jewish internees in Canada during that time.

Enemy Aliens runs through June 2013, after which it will become available as a travelling exhibit throughout Canada. Next month, it will also be available on an interactive website through which an international audience will be able to "handle" and examine documents online and gain a greater understanding of this story through its virtual presence.

United Church reveals obsession with Israel

As this column went to press, it was announced that the United Church of Canada had voted in favour of boycotting Israeli settlement products.

On the very day that the 57-member Organisation of Islamic Cooperation expelled Syria for its ongoing butchery and torture of its citizens, and during a time when Iran supports this carnage and also threatens – while it races to develop nuclear weapons – to annihilate Israel, all the church could concern itself within foreign affairs was to denounce the Jewish state. Psychiatry has a name for this – obsession.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As reported in the Toronto Star, Bruce Gregersen, a United Church general council officer and spokesperson praised the church's decision while criticizing efforts to have it go the other way: "If there was any sense that all the [anti-report] lobbying was going to have an effect, the council made up its own mind, irrespective of the lobby," he said.

So "the [Jewish] lobby" was not going to have its way with the church.

How very brave.

One of the limitations of According to Reports is that since it's written a week before it appears in print, events may well outstrip what's been analyzed in it.

Given the speed of developments in Egypt, it's not surprising that this was the case in the Aug. 16 edition of The CJN. The column reported that Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi was under the gun for having cozied up with the Hamas leadership from Gaza just days before extremists from the coastal territory, under the watch of Hamas, made their way to Egypt's Sinai, where, on Aug. 5, they murdered 16 Egyptian border guards. The outrage was such that Morsi was warned against attending the guards' funerals.

The assumption at that time, in virtually all media circles reporting on these events, was that in the ongoing tussle between Morsi (together with the Muslim Brotherhood, to which he's connected) and the military, it's the military that would be strengthened at Morsi's expense.

Yet just a week later the same media were reporting the "shock" in Egypt when it was revealed that it was Morsi who had the upper hand after all. Which means the Brotherhood. What happened has been described as a "civilian counter-coup." Morsi dismissed Gen. Hussein Tantawi, head of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (SCAF), and Chief of Staff Sami Enan, and he also reversed an order previously issued by the SCAF that had severely limited his authority.

Morsi appointed Gen. Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, someone assumed to be sympathetic to the Brotherhood, as defence minister and head of the army. But it was the "civilian" Morsi who was clearly in charge and al-Sisi would be answering to him.

Still, with so much of the army brass, current and retired, heavily invested in a sizeable chunk of the economy (figures ranging up to 40 per cent have been cited frequently), it remains an open question about just how much Morsi plans to alter the deeper structure of the military, an institution that's highly respected by ordinary Egyptians.

What is also an open question is just how much power Morsi seeks. The Aug. 15 Globe and Mail carried a story by the Associated Press' Cairo-based Hamza Hendawi under a headline that pulled no punches: "In Egypt, signs point to tyranny retooled: New Islamist president grabs Mubarak-style powers."

Hendawi wrote that in addition to his shake-up of the military, Morsi has also "moved to silence influential critics in the media." He has replaced scores of editors with others more to his liking. "The question now is whether there is any institution in the country that can check the power of Morsi and the Brotherhood and stop them from taking over the nation's institutions and consolidating their grip."

Crucially, Hendawi observed that "there are fears Morsi and his fundamentalist group, the Muslim Brotherhood, could turn the clock back on the country's tumultuous shift to democratic rule and pursue their goal of someday turning the most populous Arab nation into an Islamic state."

Book helps patients speak up for their own care

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Lisa Newman is urging patients and their families to take charge of their own health care.

The co-author of Journeys in Cancerland with John-Peter Bradford, Newman, 67, is a psychiatric social worker who has spent much of her career working in hospitals.

But when her husband, David Greenspan, a Toronto lawyer, became ill – he died in 2005 – Newman, a mother and grandmother, learned about being on the consumer end of the health-care system.

"I knew so much about hospitals, but not what it was like to be on the other side," she said. "The whole health-care system wanted to make us scream. It is a provider-centred system that is not oriented for patients."

She said out to write a book, she said, because she wanted to help other families in similar circumstances.

The Patients' Association of Canada, a patient-led organization that believes the health-care system can be improved through patient participation, came on board. It published the book through its publishing arm, Health and Everything Publications.

Dr. Sholom Glouberman, an associate scientist at Baycrest's Kunin-Lunenfeld Research Unit and president of the association, says in the forward that both Newman and Bradford, who tells the story of his own illness, are excellent examples of how people have begun to take charge of their own care.

"The [book] is a practical and comprehensive guide that will be indispensible to all caregivers," Glouberman writes.

Newman said that her introduction to adult caregiving came about before her husband's illness, when her bedridden, elderly mother had trouble breathing.

Newman had a doctor come to the house, and he recommended taking her mother to the emergency room.

"Everything I knew about hospitals told me that whatever else was going to happen that night, Mom should not go to emergency, [where she could risk] infections, falls and worse."

She convinced the doctor to prescribe an antibiotic, she said, and her mother recovered.

She stresses in the book that the health-care system is not systematic at all. "It is really a very loose, complex, un-co-ordinated array of services, many of them unaware of one another."

For their loved ones to get the best care, she said, family members need to facilitate health-care professionals working together, especially if they're in different institutions.

"You are the expert on your loved one. Your information can shape the best decisions for their care."

An important thing to remember, she said, is that secretaries and clerks can be your best friends.

"They often have the power to influence your journey for better or for worse, including finding you an appointment time where none existed, facilitating your speaking to a doctor, or more. You score a lot of points by being courteous and respectful."

The health-care system, as it stands, is modeled on the military, with top-down orders, she said.

Lisa Newman

"We need a wind to blow through the system. People need to be empowered from the bottom up. They need to own their information, and they need to speak up and ask questions. Someone needs to speak from the patient's point of view."

Newman said that she and Bradford are similar in that they don't accept things without question.

"Both of us see better ways of doing things. You have to be alert at all times. Patients can't do it alone," she said.

"You can't count on the system to know your loved one like you do. Your presence is important."

The book is available online from Amazon and Indigo, as well as from the Patients' Association of Canada.

HIV peptide could help treat cancer

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21C

Could a protein encoded by human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) provide a novel treatment for cancer?

A recently developed and patented product from the lab of Prof. Emeritus Moshe Kotler and Dr. Roni Nowarski at the Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School seems to do just that.

A peptide derived from the HIV "Vif" protein increases the vulnerability of cancer cells to radiation and chemotherapy, as Kotler and his four PhD and post-grad students describe in scientific detail in the new issue of the American Society of Hematology journal Blood.

Kotler's group investigates cellular proteins that are effective in combating the HIV-1 virus. One of these proteins is APOBEC3G (A3G for short), which is neutralized by Vif.

A couple of years ago, the researchers turned their attention to the physiological functions of A3G and found that it's involved in repairing DNA damage from radiation.

They discovered that not just the Vif protein, but also a small peptide derived from Vif inhibit A3G, keeping broken DNA strands from knitting themselves back together.

This is of significant interest to the war on cancer, because cancerous cells, such as lymphoma cells, can't be vanquished unless their DNA strands are broken apart. The reparative action of A3G makes this task tough, so inhibiting it is helpful.

Circle of Care aided 450 survivors in last year

"Our core community that we are connected to both historically and culturally is the Jewish community," said Scheinert, adding that now Circle of Care has staff that speak multiple languages, including Russian, Hebrew, Spanish and Mandarin, to better serve Toronto's diverse population.

In the last year, Circle of Care has assisted some 450 Holocaust survivors. The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany helps fund Circle of Care services for survivors.

This year, in order to deal with growing demand, Circle of Care, which employs more than 525 staff and serves about 6,000 clients, moved into a large, modern office.

The new Yonge Street and York Mills Road location accommodates the staff on a single floor, in contrast to the previous location on Wilson Avenue, where the organization had three floors. Scheinert explained that the change allows employees to work more collaboratively.

Lisa Levin, Circle of Care's vice-president of communications and development, added that the collaborative model has also been carried through in the organization's operation. While in the past, people would phone in to separate departments to request either home-care services, meals on wheels or transportation, they now call a central phone number at which a staff member can inform them of the options available to them and help assess their needs. "If they need one [service], they often need another," Levin explained.

Circle of Care is planning to add a satellite office at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., in December to have better access to the growing senior community north of Toronto.

"The bottom line is you need to increase services," Levin said. In the last year alone, Circle of Care has seen a lot of growth in demand for their services: an 11 per cent growth in transportation services, nine per cent for meals on wheels, 14 per cent in home services and a three per cent growth in services for Holocaust survivors.

According to Arnold Foss, who works primarily with the survivors, the survivor population requiring services is increasing. "Those who were child survivors are beginning to age," he said.

For Scheinert and the Circle of Care team, being able to help seniors live well at home is of utmost importance. "The majority of older people can function at home provided they have the supports they need," he said.

He believes that Circle of Care's employees and many services are well prepared for the growing senior population. "We're very fortunate in putting all of those pieces together to give us [the organization] we have today."

For more information about Circle of Care, call 416-635-2860 and/or visit circleofcare.com.

Principal remembered as 'an uncommon woman'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Robyn Shiner touched a diverse range of students, colleagues, friends and family members, as evidenced by the standing-room-only crowd of just over 1,000 people at her funeral last week.

The Toronto Jewish educator, who was just named general studies principal at Netivot HaTorah Day School in June, worked previously at Leo Baeck Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Associated Hebrew Schools.

Obituary

She died Aug. 16 at Mount Sinai Hospital, 10 days after returning from a vacation with her husband, Mark, and learning that she had leukemia. She was 55 years old.

Reuven Stern, Netivot's head of school, told The CJN that Shiner was "a unique person, very committed to the field of education, very caring, giving... willing to go the extra mile for the student," in addition to mentoring new teachers, developing new curriculum and services, and being available to families.

Although Stern said it's not necessarily uncommon for a woman, particularly a non-Orthodox woman, to become principal of an Orthodox school, he said Shiner was "an uncommon woman" for her ability as a pedagogue and an administrator. She was well-liked and respected, he added.

"We all valued her opinion and looked toward her for her insights," he said. "She will be missed by everyone on staff."

Shiner had been at the school for 20 years, first as an employee of JVS working in special education. She served as general studies vice-principal for the past decade, and was originally hired as head of student support services (special education).

A graduate of the University of Ottawa, Shiner studied education there while Mark was in law school.

In an interview, her son, Daniel, called it "a beautiful juxtaposition" that his mother was inspired by big ideas and often stayed at work late to run meetings, while at the same time, she spent lunch hours eating with students and talking about their problems. "It's almost a snapshot of the type of person and educator she was."

Mark added that the lunches "gave her a real insight into the dynamics of being that age, and let her understand which children were in need.

Robyn Shiner

Family friend Peter Seligman – who knew Shiner for almost 40 years, since their high school days – described her in a eulogy as "a beautiful, elegant and gracious human being who shared her warmth, intellect and calm wisdom, providing a guiding light."

Only six weeks ago, he said, they went on "a hell of a hard seven-mile walk" – one of "countless" power walks – and she wanted to go farther.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin, also speaking at the funeral, said Shiner "was the type who somehow always got it right, never overstepping and never underachieving.

"It speaks volumes about how she transcended what so often divides people," he said, "that she's recognized as such a gifted part of the Netivot family."

The school encouraged her to study to qualify as a principal, and she took the course for Jewish school principals at York University the first year it was offered, he said. The following year, she was asked to teach it.

Rabbi Dolgin called Shiner a "gifted" educator, but he had even higher words of praise for her as a mother. "So many teenagers stop talking with their parents," he said. "It sounds like [daughter] Laura had to compete with her friends when she was a teenager to find time to talk to Robyn, because so many found her counsel so valuable."

Shiner leaves her husband Mark, daughter Laura and son Daniel, her parents Arnold Morrison and Wilma Morrison Friedman and their spouses, and her siblings Stephen, David and Lisa Morrison.

Long-time caterer loved a celebration

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Euclides (Bill) Batista, who died suddenly on Aug. 10 at age 67, is remembered for always loving a celebration.

A caterer with Caterers York for more than 40 years, he worked closely with the Jewish community, catering private kosher functions and holiday meals, as well as serving Adath Israel, Beth Tikvah, Beth Sholom and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogues.

His son, Christopher, 37, said that his father, who as born in Portugal and came here as a teenager, loved to help his clients celebrate their life milestones.

Batista, who worked full time until the day he died, started his career at Beth Tzedec Congregation as a dishwasher, where he worked for Mickey Firestone, the synagogue's caterer. He worked his way up in the company, and in the late 1980s, Batista became "the face" of Caterers York. He collaborated closely with his chefs to develop innovative and traditional kosher cuisine.

He was a business and life partner of Mickey's daughter, Sharon Firestone, until her death in 2008.

"Catering was my father's life. Other than golfing, his personal life was his job, and he worked every day non-stop. He catered or he golfed. If he wasn't feeding people, he was golfing," said Batista.

"He had a work ethic like no other man. He was dependable, loyal and honest, and treated everyone equally from the dishwasher to the head chef," he said.

Bernie Rabinovitch, executive director of Adath Israel Synagogue, who worked with Batista since 2007, called him an extraordinary worker. "Needless to say, being in the business from his late teens, he knew the laws of kashrut inside out."

Moishe Brown, Caterers York executive chef and Batista's business partner, said Batista was dedicated to serving the Jewish community. "The High Holiday season is not going to be the same without him."

Batista was the son of Antonio and the late Ilda Batista, father and father-in-law of Natalie and Andrew Miller, and Christopher and Candice, and grandfather of Nicholas, Colin and Cameron Miller.

A memorial gathering was held on Aug. 16 at the Morley Bedford Funeral Home in Toronto.

Shabbat in Oswiecim 'meaningful': student

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

University of Toronto PhD student Caroline Cormier, one of 10 students who spent three weeks on a Holocaust education program to Poland, said that as a member of the last generation who'll be able to hear Holocaust testimony first-hand, she feels an obligation to keep the memory alive.

The 26-year-old history and Jewish studies student was selected by the Auschwitz Jewish Center Foundation (AJCF) to take part in the fully subsidized program funded by private donors and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

In addition to visiting Nazi concentration camps in Poland and hearing testimony from Holocaust survivors, the program, which began in New York City on July 1, included visits to Krakow, Warsaw, Auschwitz and Lodz.

The group explored Poland's rich Jewish heritage, and met with local Jewish and non-Jewish leaders to learn about prewar Jewish life and the Jewish community in Poland today.

"We are the last [generation] to be able to meet with survivors and hear their stories," said Cormier, whose research includes examining how collective and individual memories of extreme violence and trauma are presented in commemoration projects.

"We are the ones who have been entrusted to continue to share these stories and, in doing so, ensuring that the world can't either deny the Holocaust or allow it to become simply another footnote in our history textbooks."

Cormier's interest in studying the Holocaust and other genocides dates back to her days as a Queen's University undergraduate student.

After hearing the testimony of a Rwandan genocide survivor at a conference, she became involved with

Caroline Cormier

STAND Canada, a student-led organization that advocates for the victims of the genocide in Darfur.

"At the same time, I began working with an organization called SHOUT Canada, a student group under the umbrella of the Canadian Center for Diversity, which was committed to educating students about the Holocaust," Cormier said.

In 2008, she participated in the March of Remembrance and Hope program, which educates students about the Holocaust and the dangers of intolerance, taking them on trips to Germany and Poland.

Cormier is also involved in the Azrieli Foundation's Sustaining Memoirs Project, which aims to record Holocaust survivors' testimony.

With all her background knowledge on the subject, Cormier still credits the AJCF trip for providing her with an experience that will help her "advocate for those people in our world whose lives continue to be affected by the horrors of genocide today."

While the trip was based around a horrific historical event, she learned that Poland should not be defined solely by its dark past.

"It was inspiring to see the ways in which non-Jewish Poles have taken responsibility for the past and the ways in which they are trying to preserve the Jewish past," Cormier said.

"We visited Bedzin where we met with... a young couple who have... fought to preserve a former private shul and a beit midrash in the city, as well as developed a number of public commemoration projects, which they have incorporated into the city landscape."

She said there were countless other examples of Polish groups that are dedicated to the restoration and preservation of Jewish landmarks.

She said before they arrived in Oswiecim, which is a town just a few kilometres from the Auschwitz death camp, "I have to admit that I had a hard time thinking about the place in terms other than death and horror."

Cormier explained that before 1939, the 400-year-old Jewish community made up more than half of the population.

"Today the only traces of the Jewish community in the town is an empty lot where the Great Synagogue used to stand tall, a small cemetery located at the edge of the town and a small shul preserved by the Auschwitz Jewish Center," she said.

"For this reason, our celebration of Shabbat in Oswiecim was incredibly meaningful... Lighting candles on Friday night and... sitting down to dinner with a group of students from across North America – both Jewish and non-Jewish – reminded me of the fact that life goes on."

Writing can be a powerful tool

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

As my yearlong position as The CJN's campus columnist nears its end, I cannot help but reflect on my term. As a columnist, I was given the opportunity to learn about a plethora of people and discuss topics such as Israel's branding initiatives, different interfaith projects, the value of Holocaust education and even about Igbo Jews in Nigeria. After much thought about how to best sign off, I decided to compile a list of the top 10 things I have realized over the past year.

1) Judaism is truly a remarkable religion and the State of Israel is indispensable to Jews throughout the world, whether you support it or not. Though I can't say I'm an expert on Buddhism or Jainism or Christianity, I can say, through my experience that the Jewish community is tight-knit, generous, caring and genuine. Due to our unique history during which we faced oppression, slavery, genocide, abuse, ill treatment and other similar disasters, we have been able to rise up stronger and more unified than ever.

2) There is a phrase that goes as follows: "A barking dog is more useful than a sleeping lion." Find your passion, commit to it, act on it and be prepared to defend it. My passion lies in the future of our Jewish community. In other words, as my mom always says to me and I will now relay to you, go and be fabulous in everything and anything that you do.

3) Sometimes subjects or issues that may interest you may not interest those around you. Do not be discouraged! Nonetheless, associating yourself with others who are like-minded can be quite inspiring.

4) My dad said in his speech at my bat mitzvah almost eight years ago: "Do not go to where the path may lead. Instead, go to where there is no path and lead a trail." I truly think this mantra is applicable to anyone in any walk of life. Never be meek. Always be bold.

5) Never brush away opportunities as they may come. Every action has a reaction, and some opportunities arrive in interesting ways and during the most unsuspecting of times.

6) Not everyone will always agree with your opinions, but welcome criticism and judgment with respect and an open mind.

7) One of the best feelings is watching your hard work come to fruition. Seeing any project become and be successful is highly rewarding.

8) Some of the best lessons are learned outside of the classroom. I enjoy school and academia, but I know that authentic tests stretch far beyond exams and some of the most intelligent individuals are not professors and may not possess PhDs.

9) Know that success is not predicated on luck. Rather, the recipe for success requires additional ingredients such as hard work, determination, confidence and persistence.

10) I recently came across an excellent quote by Benjamin Franklin that I thought would be fitting to wrap up my list. He said, "Either write something worth reading or do something worth writing." Words to definitely live by.

During the year, I have learned that writing can be a powerful tool. It can untangle complex ideas and insights, tell stories, solve mundane problems and even evoke change. Writing, in my view, is one of the purest forms of expression, and I am humbled to have been given the chance to communicate with you. I bid farewell, with gratitude for this special opportunity.

It is absolutely imperative that Jewish students continue to be given means and opportunities, such as the one I was fortunately provided with, to safeguard the name of our indispensable State of Israel, preserve our vital Jewish values and customs and comment on vital issues of the day through the paramount vehicle of the written word.

Toronto chef's insights on sous-vide cooking

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Chef Yehuda Goldberg is bringing insights gained in high-end kitchens in Europe and Toronto to the world of Jewish cuisine. And in sous-vide cooking, he believes he's found just the tool to do it.

"I've been cooking professionally about seven years now," says Goldberg, a Red Seal-certified chef (an interprovincial apprenticeship-based certification in various trades). His professional career began with Menchen's Catering, and his path has taken several twists and turns before ending up right around the corner, so to speak, at Lechaim Catering in Toronto.

A year in Europe, including a meeting with legendary chef Paul Bocuse and a stage (apprenticeship) at Le Bistrot de Lyon, in Lyon, France, awakened him to a less stressful approach. On cooking shows, we see a bit of what goes on in kitchens: abuse, anger, stress. In Europe, it's different. "Yes, people are screaming," says Goldberg, "but it's not the angry screaming you see in North America."

"I run my kitchens the way we did when I was a cook in Europe… in a calmer fashion." This lets cooks be "more careful about their work, show more respect for their food, for the dishes," driven by pride in their accomplishments and creativity.

Returning to Toronto, Goldberg became executive chef for a non-kosher "gastro pub" that received media attention last year around the fact that its innovative young chef came from a family of Lubavitcher Chassidim. Now, however, he's "made a conscious decision to move into a kosher setting."

Goldberg says he's "respectful" of his family's traditions, though he doesn't practise the same way. However, he and his wife do keep kosher at home, where he explores new ways to bring kosher food into the 21st century.

"I get very excited about sous-vide cooking," says Goldberg. Literally, "under vacuum," sous vide involves cooking food in vacuum-sealed (food-safe) plastic bags, immersed in a low-temperature water bath. Cooking times are generally longer: duck could take up to six hours to reach medium-rare doneness, and 72 hours is not unheard of. Even a chicken breast might take an hour at 140 degrees.

"Who cooks chicken for an hour?" Goldberg asks rhetorically. "Usually, you're going to overcook it… dry heat dries out the meat." Yet, prepared sous vide, it's "just so moist and delicious." Within the bag, Goldberg might add a bit of garlic confit, garlic oil and just a bit of white wine. Not much is needed because seasonings maintain constant contact with the food.

Inside, sous-vide-cooked meat is completely uniform. "With steak on the barbecue, the outside is well done, slightly underneath is medium-well, and you hope the centre is going to be medium-rare, perfect, the way you want it." With sous vide, "the entire steak is medium-rare."

Meat is seared quickly before serving, since "you're not going to get any colour in the bag." Searing "brings the sugars back to the outside," adding colour and a delightful exterior texture.

Until recently, sous-vide equipment was only available for commercial kitchens. However, a line of smaller machines, which take up only the space of a breadmaker, is now available. It's perfect for busy people. "Put something in in the morning, come home, open the bag, sear it and it's dinner." You can even marinate meat for a couple of days in the bag for extra flavour.

Overcooking is nearly impossible. "The gentle massaging of the water around the meat keeps the temperature consistent." Meat isn't the only food that can be prepared to perfection. Vegetables emerge not just tasty, but vibrantly colourful, since the cooking process is gentle. Even a simple preparation – carrots with a bit of butter – can open new worlds of flavour and texture.

Though still rare, sous vide is appearing in more high-end kitchens, and Goldberg believes it could make a world of difference in kosher catering, though Lechaim isn't currently using it. "For Jewish weddings, [you could make] really nice garnishes for the plates, they can go out… like a five-star kind of dish."

The quantity of food is limited only on the water-bath size, which ranges from 10 litres (a small home machine) to 50 quarts (about 200 litres). Bags range from individual sizes to one that holds 40 chicken pieces, and can even be reused – cut down smaller and resealed. Plus, the underwater cooking is more efficient than a comparable braising time using electricity or gas, so the cost can be much lower. "It costs less than turning on your oven," to create "a healthier meal: less salt or additives."

Whether cooking sous vide or the old-fashioned way, Goldberg sees food trends moving towards slower food and "family-style" comfort food. "Making a nice big pot of something and everybody enjoys it."

In his own French cooking classes, participants often leave saying, "Oh, that was so easy to make." "Chefs on TV try to show how high they can build a tower on the plate, how elaborate they can make it… [but] really, it's all about simplicity."

As for kosher cuisine, it's catching up. Saying that food is kosher can't be an excuse for second-rate dishes. "The limitations are very small… As I can see in New York and California, kosher food is really pretty close to, or on par with, the non-kosher restaurants."

But he says we need more respect between restaurant owners and customers. "The Jewish community has to support kosher establishments better." Toronto Jews must give new restaurants a chance, but in return, he says that "owners cannot gouge customers by charging $50 a steak when it cost them $6." He hopes we'll see more chef-owned kosher restaurants, as these have the best chance of succeeding.

"I've worked with Michelin star chefs, some of the greatest chefs in the world… you can do those kind of things kosher, too. Just give somebody the chance."

Tzimmes as a side dish has many variations

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

One of the best side dishes for a Shabbat dinner – or almost any other meal – is tzimmes. Usually a baked stew of carrots, potatoes, sometimes meat, and often with dried fruit like prunes, tzimmes has as many incarnations and varieties of ingredients as there were countries Jews lived in.

The following recipes have been shared with me by readers, family and friends.

POTATO TZIMMES

2 lb. large carrots, peeled and cut into 1-in. slices
2 lb. sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into 1-in. cubes
2 lb. white potatoes (any work fine, I use russet), peeled and cut into 1-in. cubes
5 cups water
1 cup coarsely chopped prunes
1/4 cup honey
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1 large lemon's rind, finely grated
1 cup water
1 tbsp. butter or margarine

Preheat the oven to 350. Cook the carrots in boiling water for 5 minutes. Then add all of the potatoes to the pot and boil for an additional 5 minutes.

At this point, the vegetables will barely seem tender – don't worry. Drain the potatoes and carrots well. Add the prunes, honey, nutmeg, cinnamon, lemon rind and 1 cup of water. Pour the mixture this into a greased 3-qt. baking dish (should be shallow, not deep).

Dot the top with the butter or margarine. Bake for 1/2 hour. If you see it is browning, cover it loosely with aluminum foil. Serves 8 to 10.

APPLE VEGETABLE TZIMMES

6 cups raw sweet potatoes, peeled and sliced
6 cups sliced, unpeeled cooking apples
1 1/2 cups carrots, peeled, sliced
1 cup small pitted prunes, cut in half
2 tsp. grated orange peel
1/4 cup unsweetened orange juice
1/4 cup honey (optional)
2 tbsp. light brown sugar pinch of cinnamon
pinch of ground ginger

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a 9x13-in. baking pan with a non-stick spray. Layer half of the potatoes in the bottom of the pan, overlapping the edges. Repeat with half of the apples then spread half of the carrots and prunes over the top. Repeat layers. In a bowl combine the orange peel, orange juice, honey, brown sugar, cinnamon and ginger and mix well. Drizzle the sauce evenly over the top and then tilt the pan to make sure it covers all the layers. Cover tightly with a sheet of aluminum foil. Pierce with 8-10 one-inch slits so steam can vent. Bake for 1 to 1-1/2 hours or until dish is steamed and tender. Serves 10 to 12.

BARLEY APRICOT TZIMMES

4 cups water, boiling
3/4 cup dried apricot
1 cup egg barley
1/2 cup honey
1/4 cup oil
1 tsp. salt

In a pot, pour boiling water over the apricots; cover and soak for 1 hour. Place the pot over medium heat and bring to a boil. Stir in egg barley, honey, oil and salt. Pour into a 2-quart casserole. Bake, covered, at 375 for 45 minutes; uncover and bake another 15 minutes. Serve warm. Serves 6.

Holiday Food Ideas

Symbolism and family traditions

Editorial

Even as the summer lingers, Jews around the world begin to think about the High Holidays, which begin with Rosh Hashanah on the first two days of Tishrei, and culminate with Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

The holidays are a time of introspection. We take stock of our past year, repent for our sins, and become joyous as we look forward to starting the new year with a clean slate.

We also look forward to getting together with family and friends and celebrating the holidays at dining room tables laden with our favourite foods, those that are symbolic of the season and those that are traditional to each family.

Best-known of the symbolic holiday foods are apples and honey, and dishes, from appetizers to desserts, that incorporate these two favourite ingredients.

There are, however, a host of other foods that remind us that this is the time to pray for a happy and blessed new year.

We eat circular challahs, which represent the unending circle of life, but we avoid nuts, because the Hebrew word for nut has the same numerical value as the word for sin.

Some families eat fish as a reminder to be fruitful, because fish multiply in great numbers. Others eat leeks or cabbage because these vegetables are known as karsi, related to the word karet, to cut off or destroy. This represents our desire that our enemies be destroyed.

No matter what our family traditions are, we prepare the holiday meals keeping in mind the symbolism and our family's tastes.

In the upcoming food supplements, we have attempted to bring you recipes that incorporate the holiday's traditions. Our hope is that you will find some dishes that you can add to your family's favourites.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you happy cooking, and most of all, a Shanah Tovah.

A Jewish Response to Hunger – Une réponse juive à la faim

Veggies to add colour and flavour

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah typically falls smack dab in the middle of Canadian Indian summer. So, if the scads of apples and the promise of bowls flowing with honey are not enough to make you smile and inspire your holiday meal, then all you have to do is cast a glance at the huge variety of still in season produce to whet your appetite.

Zucchini threatens to overwhelm our gardens, tomatoes still beckon with their sweet aroma, and a rainbow of sweet peppers vie for our attention. And that's just a small example of the largesse that we can find at our local grocery and produce stores.

For your special Rosh Hashanah meals this year, I've put together a small collection of colourful and incredibly easy but lip-smacking delicious vegetable recipes. They use only a few of the vegetables that this season boasts, but I'm confident that they will please adventurous and picky palates alike.

CORN AND MULTI-COLOURED PEPPER SAUTE

For this recipe, try to use fresh corn. Hold ear upright on a cutting board, tapered end at top. Using a sharp chef's knife, cut through the kernels to remove. Depending on the size of corn you choose, you will need anywhere from 3 to 5 ears of corn to yield three cups of kernels.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 small onion, thinly sliced
3 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup chicken stock
3 cups fresh corn kernels
1 each sweet red, green and orange pepper, trimmed, seeded and julienned
1/4 cup chopped fresh basil

Heat oil in non-stick skillet set over medium heat. Add onion and garlic; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or until onion is softened. Stir in salt and pepper for 30 seconds. Pour in chicken stock; bring to a boil over medium high heat. Add corn and sweet peppers, Cook, stirring, for 5 to 7 minutes or until vegetables are tender crisp. Stir in basil. Season to taste with more salt and pepper if desired. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

SAUTEED ZUCCHINI WITH MUSTARD TARRAGON VINAIGRETTE

This side dish is served hot or at room temperature

1 1/2 lb. zucchini , about 3 large
4 tsp. extra virgin olive oil salt and pepper

Vinaigrette:
1 shallot, minced
2 tbsp. tarragon or sherry vinegar
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 tbsp. finely chopped fresh tarragon (or 1 tsp. dried tarragon)
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
5 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil

Vinaigrette: In small bowl or glass measure, combine shallot, vinegar, mustard, tarragon, salt and pepper. In a thin gradual stream, slowly whisk in olive oil until emulsified. (Vinaigrette can be refrigerated in an airtight container for up to 5 days. Rewhisk to combine)

Trim ends of zucchini. Cut into thirds crosswise. Cut each third lengthwise into 4 pieces. Cut each piece lengthwise into 4 rectangles.

Heat oil in large skillet set over medium-high heat. Add zucchini and season lightly with salt and pepper. Cook, stirring often, for 5 to 7 minutes or until softened and starting to turn golden. Transfer to serving bowl or platter. Drizzle with vinaigrette. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

BROCCOLI RAAB WITH LEMON AND GARLIC

Be sure to blanche the broccoli raab first or it may seem bitter.

1 lb. broccoli raab (rapini), rinsed, trimmed and cut crosswise into large pieces
3 tbsp. olive oil
3 large cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 cup chopped, peeled and toasted hazelnuts (optional)

In large pot of boiling, lightly salted water, cook broccoli raab for 2 minutes. Drain immediately; rinse under cold running water. Drain well. (Broccoli raab can be covered lightly and refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Bring to room temperature before continuing.)

Heat oil in large non-stick skillet set over medium-low. Add garlic; cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Stir in lemon zest, salt and pepper. Add broccoli raab, stirring until well coated. Increase heat to medium-high. Cook, stirring constantly, for about 3 minutes or until heated through. Transfer to serving bowl or platter. Drizzle lemon juice over. Sprinkle with hazelnuts, if using. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Sweeten your challah with honey, apples or raisins

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

In Judaism there is a lot of symbolism in many of the foods we eat. The Talmud tells us that God braided Eve's hair for her marriage to Adam, and therefore we braid our Sabbath challah. On Rosh Hashanah we traditionally make our challahs round, symbolizing the continuing cycle of the year and also the crown of God.

We also make our challah sweeter than usual at this time to symbolize the hope for a sweet new year. Many people add raisins or apples and use honey instead of sugar in the Rosh Hashanah challah.

If you have a favourite challah recipe, you can use it as a basis for a special holiday challah. If you generally use sugar in the dough, substitute honey, measure for measure, and you can add extra honey to make your dough sweeter. If you want to add raisins or apples, there are two ways to do it. First, mix together the following: 1 peeled apple, diced into small pieces, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 teaspoon cinnamon and a dash of nutmeg.

AMY'S ULTIMATE CHALLAH

If you like a very rich challah, this is the recipe for you.

2 1/4 cups warm water
2 1/4 sticks margarine, melted
3 eggs
3 egg whites
1 tbsp. vanilla
1 1/2 cups honey or sugar
1 tbsp. salt
12 cups bread flour
3 tbsp. yeast

Mix ingredients together well and knead, either by hand or in a stand mixer, until smooth and elastic. Place in a greased bowl and let rise, covered, for 1-1/2 hours or until dough has doubled in size. Punch down dough and remove from bowl onto a lightly floured counter. Braid it and let rise again 1/2 hour. Brush with egg wash and bake in a preheated oven at 300° for 25-30 minutes. Makes 3 large challahs or 6 small ones.

BASIC CHALLAH

This makes a very fluffy challah.
1 1/4 cups water
1 tbsp. active dry or instant yeast
3 tbsp. honey
3 eggs + 1 egg for wash
1/2 cup canola or vegetable oil
6 cups bread flour
2 tsp. salt
sesame or poppy seeds or cinnamon sugar for topping (optional)

Place very warm but not hot water in mixing bowl. Add yeast and honey, mixing lightly. Allow to sit for 10 minutes or so – I usually do less – until you see little eruptions. Add eggs and oil and mix with wooden spoon.

If you have a stand mixer, add flour and salt and beat with dough hook. Remember: salt kills yeast. Don't put the salt in with the yeast. Wait until you've added some of the flour.

If the dough is not holding together as a ball, add a bit more oil or water. If the dough is very sticky, add more flour. The dough is ready when it sticks together as a ball and is not sticky to the touch when you poke your finger in (5-10 minutes of beating). Turn the ball out onto a floured work surface and punch a few times until very smooth.

Place in oiled bowl and cover with plastic wrap or a towel. Allow to rise at least one hour, preferably more, until dough has doubled in size. I only do one rise as a ball, but you can do more. I'm not convinced it does much to the texture but some people swear by it.

Punch down the ball in the bowl and remove. Punch out all air bubbles. Braid in your preferred method. Allow to rise 20-30 minutes. Top with an egg wash (I use the whole egg) and sesame or poppy seeds if you like.

Bake at 350 for 25-30 minutes. I like to use a meat thermometer to test for doneness. Challah will be perfectly baked at 190 degrees F. You can always add foil if the top seems as if it's browning too fast. Makes 2 medium loaves.

Fruit and other specialties for the new year

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Eating unfamiliar fruits at Rosh Hashanah is a favourite custom for many.

Rabbi Mordecai Finley, co-founder with his wife, Meirav Finley, of Temple Ohr Ha Torah in Los Angeles, Calif., says he was delighted the first time he saw this practice.

"My rabbi's wife put out a platter of kumquats, loquats, kiwis and fruits I don't even remember the names of – and we all excitedly sampled them," he said.

The eating of sweet fruits signifies the wish for a sweet New Year.

On Rosh Hashanah, we dip apples and challah into honey. Dried fruit, sugar and honey are used to sweeten traditional dishes including entrees, vegetables, salads and desserts. The challah is round instead of loaf-shaped to symbolize no beginning and no end. Raisins are added for additional sweetness.

Meirav Shevah Finley learned to cook from her Yemenite grandmother. "Whenever I walked into her kitchen, the aromas were so strong, her personality seemed intertwined with the food. Today, whenever I make one of her dishes, I feel her right there in the kitchen with me. Since Grandma later moved to Israel via Egypt, my mother was French and I was brought up in Israel, you could say my cooking is multicultural."

S'CHUG
From Meirav Shevah Finley

Reminiscent of Japanese wasabi, this pungent paste punctuates a plethora of Yemenite dishes. It is served in small, individual bowls or to decorate the corner of a dinner plate. Go lightly at first, Meirav warns. It's quite spicy Her grandmother made s'chug by rubbing the ingredients between 2 stones. As a concession to modern times, Meirav uses a food processor. Wear rubber gloves when working with peppers or their juice will get under your skin.

7-8 bunches cilantro, with all but two in. of stem included
15 to 20 garlic cloves, peeled
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1/2 tsp. saffron threads
2 small hot red peppers, quartered, seeded and tops removed
2 small hot green peppers, quartered, seeded and tops removed

Place cilantro, garlic, cumin, pepper and saffron in food processor. Whir for one minute. Add peppers and process until smooth. Makes 2 cups.

EGYPTIAN FISH
From Meirav Shevah Finley

This is her grandmother's favourite dish. It is best prepared with boned carp and whitefish, but whitefish alone is fine.

20 cloves garlic, mashed olive oil as needed for sautéing
2 lb. tomatoes, peeled and chopped kosher salt to taste
pinch of cayenne
1 tsp. sugar
splash of white wine vinegar
pinch of saffron
2 medium fish (carp and whitefish) skin intact, cut crosswise into 1-in. pieces
4 bunches cilantro leaves, chopped
1 cup mint leaves, chopped

In a deep frying pan over medium-high heat, sauté garlic in olive oil. When golden, add tomatoes, salt, cayenne, sugar, vinegar and saffron. Cook for 45 minutes. Place fish in sauce, skin sideways, so pieces are touching each other, along with cilantro and mint. Cook 40 minutes longer, or until tender. This dish is traditionally served cold, but it is delicious hot. Makes 6 servings.

MIDDLE EASTERN SALAD

This salad is served all over the Middle East. Although we often call it Israeli Salad, it originated with the Arabs.

6 tomatoes, chopped coarsely
3 cucumbers, peeled, chopped coarsely
1 yellow or red onion, chopped coarsely
1/2 cup parsley, chopped coarsely
1/2 cup cilantro, chopped coarsely
3 scallions, sliced
1 cup romaine lettuce, chopped coarsely
1/2 cup lemon juice
1/2 cup olive oil
3 cloves garlic, pressed
salt and pepper to taste

Arrange vegetables in bowl. Place lemon juice, olive oil, garlic, salt and pepper in a screw-top jar and shake vigorously for 30 seconds to blend thoroughly. Toss dressing with vegetables. Chill for 1 hour before serving. Makes 6 servings.

AUNT DOROTHY'S ISRAELI CHICKEN

1 2-1/2 to 3 lb. roasting chicken juice of 2 oranges juice of 2 pomegranates juice of 1 lemon
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. spicy mustard, such as Dijon
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. paprika
1 tsp. chili pepper flakes
1 tsp. ground coriander
Stuffing:
1/2 cup yellow onions, chopped
1/4 cup celery, chopped
1 tsp. olive oil
1/4 cup parsley, chopped
1 orange, peeled and chopped
1 red apple, cored, peeled and chopped
1/2 cup walnuts, chopped coarsely
1/2 cup currants
1 cup couscous, cooked
2 onions, halved

Marinate chicken in orange juice, lemon juice, pomegranate juice, garlic, mustard, brown sugar, salt, paprika, chili pepper flakes and coriander for 2 hours.

In a heavy saucepan, sauté onions and celery in olive oil until wilted. Add parsley, orange pieces, apple, walnuts, currants, couscous; cook just long enough to heat through. Stuff chicken with mixture.

Place in large roasting pan and pour remaining marinade over chicken. Add 1 cup water and onions to bottom of pan. Roast chicken at 350 for 1-1/2 hours, or until tender, basting frequently. Makes 4 servings.

POMEGRANATE SEED DELIGHT

This is a wonderful accompaniment to the chicken.

6 cups pomegranate seeds
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup fresh mint, chopped

Sprinkle sugar over seeds. Let sit for 1-2 hours until they become glazed. Sprinkle with mint. Serve chilled. Makes about 6 servings.

Australian court fails to extradite alleged ex-Nazi

Dan Goldberg
JTA

SYDNEY — In a court ruling that is bringing new attention to Australia's failure to prosecute alleged Nazi-era war criminals, the government will not surrender to Hungary the man believed to be the country's last World War II war crimes suspect.

The nation's High Court ruled Wednesday that Karoly (Charles) Zentai will remain in Australia and not be extradited to his native Hungary on a war crimes charge.

The long-awaited ruling handed down in Canberra dismissed an appeal by the federal government of a Federal Court judgment that Zentai could not be extradited because war crimes was not an offence in Hungary on Nov. 8, 1944 – the date that Zentai is accused of helping to murder Peter Balazs, a Jewish teenager, in Budapest.

The federal government had approved Zentai's extradition to Hungary in 2009, but the decision was overturned on appeal last year in the Federal Court. The government then sought the ruling of the justices of nation's highest court, which has now dismissed the appeal.

Zentai is not the first alleged Nazi war criminal in Australia to avoid facing his accusers. Konrads Kalejs, an alleged leader of Latvia's notorious Arajs Kommando unit, accused of murdering thousands of Jews and Gypsies in Riga in 1942-43, died in Australia in 2001 while awaiting a court decision on whether he should be extradited to his native Latvia.

Zentai, who was a cadet sergeant in the pro-Nazi Hungarian army, has denied vehemently that he helped in the murder of the 18-year-old Balazs for not wearing the mandatory yellow Star of David before dumping his body in the Danube River. The 90-year-old Perth pensioner, who was first arrested by Australian Federal Police in 2005, claimed he left Budapest the day before Balazs was killed.

In their 5-1 verdict, the High Court judges argued that the extradition could not be approved because the Hungarian authorities had requested Zentai's surrender for war crimes, which was not an offence under Hungarian law at the time.

Zentai greeted the ruling emotionally.

"I'm just overwhelmed," he told the Australian Broadcasting Corp. in Perth. "I've been so stressed, the last few days in particular."

But the judgment was met by a chorus of condemnation as well. Michael Danby, a Jewish legislator of the governing Labor Party, slammed the verdict as "appalling."

In a speech to be delivered in parliament last week in Canberra, Danby said Hungary enacted laws in 1945 to retrospectively make war crimes an offence.

"Now when a country seeks to pursue and even investigate the crimes of former Nazis like Zentai, they will be prevented from doing so by a blockheaded majority of High Court judges," he said. "Those who voted for it shall live in infamy."

Danby said he had already approached the Hungarian ambassador to ask whether officials in Budapest will seek Zentai's extradition for murder.

Efraim Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Israel office and one of the world's leading Nazi hunters, has pursued the case since 2005. That's when the Wiesenthal Center's Operation Last Chance helped flush out Zentai's whereabouts.

"It's a very sad day for Australia, a very sad day for justice and a very sad day for the victims of the Holocaust, their relatives and anyone who has any sense of empathy with the victims of the Holocaust," he told JTA.

He said the decision was "not a reflection of Zentai's guilt or innocence," but that Australia has "totally failed" on the issue of Nazi war criminals.

Israeli chatter on Iran sending a message to D.C.

Ron Kampeas

Analysis

How much noise does Israel's leadership have to make to get the Obama administration to say what it wants to hear about Iran?

It's a question now preoccupying Israel, along with its corollary: how much noise is too much and risks precipitating a crisis between Jerusalem and its closest ally?

Some Israeli analysts say that pronounced signals from their country's leadership in recent days that it is readying for a strike against Iran are less an immediate call to arms than a call for an unequivocal commitment from the Obama administration to take the lead in such an attack or to come to Israel's aid if it goes first.

"We are at a serious juncture," said Ehud Yaari, an Israel-based fellow for the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "The way I understand it, the Israeli leadership is trying to signal to the administration that unless there is a change of tact on the part of Washington concerning the Iranian nuclear program, Israel may have to decide to make its own military move."

Avi Dichter

The signals have included:

• an interview in Ha'aretz with a top Israeli official, whom is widely believed to be Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who argued that Israel risks more in the short term by not striking than it does by striking;

• the appointment to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's cabinet of Avi Dichter, a former head of Israel's internal security service, the Shin Bet, to bring the home front up to speed. Upon taking over as the country's home-front defence minister, Dichter said that for the first time Israel is facing an existential threat from Iran, as well as strategic threats from Lebanon, Syria and Gaza.

There have been series of notices to the Israeli public, including a call to update gas-mask equipment and a listing of Tel Aviv underground parking lots that could double as bomb shelters.

There have also been a series of public statements by Israel's ambassador to Washington, Michael Oren, suggesting that an Israeli strike would reap sufficient rewards to justify it.

"One, two, three, four years are a long time in the Middle East, look what's happened in the last year," Oren said in a Bloomberg News interview, addressing the claim that an Israeli strike would "only" delay Iran and not end the nuclear program.

A key Israeli fear is that a nuclear Iran would provide an umbrella to hostile forces consolidating their hold along Israel's borders in Lebanon and the Gaza Strip, and possibly in Syria and Egypt as those nations undergo turmoil that threatens to disrupt decades of peace on their borders.

"The idea of these non-state actors on Israel's borders which may be controlled by a nuclear Iran is a serious threat, the kind of which Israel has not encountered before," Asher Susser, a senior fellow at the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Tel Aviv University, said.

Still, Obama administration officials are not yet publicly buying the rhetoric.

"I don't believe they've made a decision as to whether or not they will go in and attack Iran at this time," Defence Secretary Leon Panetta said on Aug. 15. "With regards to the issue of where we're at from a diplomatic point of view, the reality is that we still think there is room to continue to negotiate."

Gen. Martin Dempsey, the chairman of the military Joint Chiefs of Staff, said an Israeli strike would have limited effect.

"I may not know about all of their capabilities, but I think that it's a fair characterization to say that they could delay but not destroy Iran's nuclear capabilities," Dempsey said at the same briefing.

Such sanguinity may be out of place, Susser said, adding that the notices to the public regarding home-front preparedness are not feints.

The likeliest means to shut down the escalating rhetoric, Susser added, would be for the Obama administration to reassure Israel – and not necessarily in public – that it would convey to Iran that military action was inevitable and not just a possibility if Iran does not stand down.

Netanyahu and Barak would want to hear "a very firm commitment from the United States that it will use force, not anything less – not 'all options are on the table,' not 'any means necessary,' but that the U.S. will take a clear commitment to use force when the time comes," he said. "If the Israelis are convinced that the Americans are not going to take action against Iran, Barak and Netanyahu may very well come to the conclusion that they have to."

Obama administration officials over the last several months have lobbied Israel intensely to tamp down talk of a strike, and to wait out a U.S. strategy of exhausting economic and diplomatic pressure as a means of getting Iran to stand down from its suspected nuclear weapons program. Yaari said Israel's leadership was not convinced.

Israelis favour a U.S. lead should it come to military action against Iran, polls show. A poll published last week by the Israel Democracy Institute and Tel Aviv University and reported by Bloomberg News showed 61 per cent of Israelis oppose an Israeli strike without U.S. co-operation. It had a margin of error of 4.5 percentage points.

Meanwhile, a number of Israeli figures have lashed out against Netanyahu and Barak, saying that the government's ratcheting up of the rhetoric could backfire.

"It's clear to us that we can't do it alone," Israeli President Shimon Peres said on Israel's Channel Two. On the reports that the United States considers it premature to launch an attack now, Peres said, "It's clear to us we have to proceed together with America."

Shaul Mofaz, the leader of the opposition Kadima party, in a blistering Knesset speech, accused Netanyahu of trying to weigh in on the U.S. elections, undercutting Obama in favour of Mitt Romney, the presumptive Republican presidential nominee. Netanyahu, who has had tense relations with Obama, is seen as close to the Republicans and has a longstanding friendship with Romney.

"Mr. Prime Minister, you want a crude, rude, unprecedented, reckless and risky intervention in the U.S. elections," Mofaz said in remarks translated by Globes, the Israeli business daily. "You are trying to frighten us and terrify us. And in truth, we are scared – scared... you are executing a dangerous and irresponsible policy."

Meir Javedanfar, an Iran-born Israeli analyst, said that Netanyahu's talk of war diminished the real results that U.S.-led sanctions were having on the Iranian theocracy's viability.

"I don't think that the ruling echelon in Israel understands that as much as the Iranian regime does not want war, it's not an existential threat," he said. "What is an existential threat are the sanctions. And the more attention that is diverted from the existential threat of the sanctions, the less the regime needs to address them."

Right-wing Jews cheer Ryan

Jewish conservatives applauded Republican U.S presidential candidate Mitt Romney's choice of U.S. Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin as his vice-presidential nominee. But Jewish liberals who despise him and the GOP also cheered. They are certain the rise of the intellectual leader of the Republicans will give them the opportunity to blast his ideas about entitlement reform and therefore ensure President Barack Obama's victory this fall.

War could cost Israeli economy $42 billion

Greg Tepper
The Times of Israel

A war between Israel and Iran could cost the Israeli economy 167 billion shekels, or nearly $42 billion (US), Israel's Channel 10 reported on Sunday citing estimates by Business Data Israel, a business information group.

According to the projections, lost work would cost the state 39 billion shekels, or nearly $10 billion. The report didn't clarify whether this took into account reserve soldiers who are called to duty and must leave their jobs, people not working due to continuous missile assault on Israeli population centres, or both.

Rearmament and re-equipping the military and reconstructing buildings would cost the state an additional estimated 8 billion shekels, or $2 billion. The report did not mention what the possible cost of replacing military hardware, including aircraft, tanks, and helicopters, or how much the cost of intercepting incoming missiles could be.

A 10 per cent drop in commerce over five years is predicted to result from a war with Iran, for a projected loss of 120 billion shekels, or about $30 billion. The report mentioned that the financial figures don't take into account the far-reaching impact of an oil price crisis, an international recession or budget cuts to fund the war.

Last week, the outgoing minister for the home front,

The location of Haifa's industrial zone could cause a large amount of damage in the event of an attack by Iran. [Flash90 photo]

Matan Vilnai, said an Israeli attack on Iran's nuclear program could trigger a month-long war on many fronts, with 500 fatalities.

"It could be that there will be fewer deaths, but it could be there will be more. That is the scenario we are preparing for according to the best experts," Vilnai told Maariv. "The assessments are for a war that will last 30 days on a number of fronts."

Israelis struggle for normalcy on Sinai border

Ben Sales
JTA

KEREM SHALOM BORDER CROSSING, Israel — Drivers who reach the end of Israeli Route 232 purportedly face a choice: a sign points them either northwest, toward the Rafah border crossing between Egypt and the Gaza Strip, or southeast, toward the Nitzana border crossing between Egypt and Israel.

But the intersection – located at the meeting point of Israel, Gaza and Egypt – is really a dead end; drivers cannot proceed in either direction. Rafah has been under Egyptian control since Israel's disengagement from Gaza in 2005. And a year ago, Israel closed off the road that runs to Nitzana, along the country's southern border.

What drivers do meet at the end of the route is a simple red and white roadblock. To the left is the beginning of Israel's security fence on the border of the Sinai

Nitzana border crossing

Desert that is scheduled to be completed this year. To the right is Israel's Kerem Shalom border crossing with Gaza, which is closed to civilians. Next to that is a concrete wall separating Gaza and Israel. Litter dots the immediate area.

The Israeli army has stepped up security in the area since Egypt's revolution began last year, and Israel issued a travel warning this month regarding the Sinai. On Aug. 5, terrorists killed 16 Egyptian soldiers and crossed into Israel down the road from the Kerem Shalom crossing, where they were killed by Israeli security forces.

But across the street from the concrete wall, one woman sits smiling in a purple food truck. Bold letters on the side of the truck advertise: "To soldiers with love, from the loving Tami Mommy."

Tami Muyal, 62, has been operating the truck for 12 years, including the past 3-1/2 years in this location.

"There's no way a soldier gets to me and leaves hungry or thirsty," she said.

From 6:30 a.m. to 4 p.m., Muyal offers soldiers anything from popsicles to baguette sandwiches at a discount or even for free, depending on how much cash they have on hand. She knows many of them by name.

"I had a dream to open a rest stop for soldiers," said Muyal, formerly a bookkeeper. "It's a challenge, not like sitting in an office. There's sand, dust, heat, and it's great."

Muyal has moved her truck around Israel's south, at one time stationing it in Gush Katif, Israel's former settlement bloc in Gaza.

"A sniper could hit me right here," she said, pointing beneath her curly brown hair at a slightly wrinkled forehead.

Muyal doesn't feel safe where she is on the Egyptian border, either. She says the border crossing has seemed abandoned, save for increased Israeli army traffic, since trouble began in the Sinai last year. She lives in the area, where she raised four children.

"I ask myself, 'What am I doing here?' " she said. "The situation is scary. I don't think anything is clear. I'm here alone. Where would I go?"

Born in Tunisia, Muyal moved to Israel with her family when she was 10, in 1960. Since then, she has lived in this area – for the past 40 years in the nearby town of Yesha. Despite the frequent threats of violence, Muyal declares confident faith in the Israeli army – "an army I'm proud of."

While Muyal has inserted herself in the middle of the army's activities, the nearby Kibbutz Kerem Shalom, less than three miles away, is striving to continue a normal routine despite the unrest across the border. The area was the site of the 2006 kidnapping of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit by Hamas, the terrorist organization that governs Gaza.

Kibbutz Kerem Shalom

Now the concrete wall that divides Gaza and Israel surrounds two-thirds of the kibbutz. Bright murals cover parts of the wall, but most of it remains grey.

"When you live here, you don't see it," Ofer Kissin, who heads the kibbutz's security, said of the wall. "We've returned to routine life. It takes time, but we're used to situations like this."

Kissin said that five families had recently joined the kibbutz, bringing its total to 30. The collective nature of the kibbutz helps residents weather the attacks, Kissin says, but the true source of the community's secure feeling comes from the military presence nearby.

"The army takes care of us," he said. "Kids run around here at night."

Kissin declined to give specifics on the Israel Defence Forces' presence around Kerem Shalom, nor did the IDF provide details on its operations there.

Muyal also says the IDF allows her to stay calm even while working at the intersection of two tense borders.

"The soldiers are brave. They love the land. Nothing scares them," Muyal said. "I'm not ready to give in."

Israel Briefs

Majority opposes strike

A majority of Israelis oppose a strike by their country on Iran's nuclear facilities without U.S. cooperation, a new poll says. Nearly 61 per cent of respondents oppose the strike without the co-operation of the United States and 27 per cent favour it, according to a poll released Thursday by the Israel Democracy Institute and Tel Aviv University's Evens Program in Mediation and Conflict Resolution. The poll also found that nearly 56 per cent of Israelis think it's unlikely that Israel would launch airstrikes against Iran unilaterally; 33 percent believe the country will go forward with the strikes on its own. The phone poll conducted last week spoke with 516 Israelis and has a 4.5 per cent margin of error. Meanwhile, Israeli groups have launched several petitions and protests against the possibility of an Israeli strike against Iran. One online petition published last week, which calls on Israel Air Force pilots to refuse to bomb Iran, has garnered hundreds of signatures.

Nasrallah sharpens sword

Hezbollah's leader threatened tens of thousands of Israeli deaths should Israel strike Iran. Hassan Nasrallah, the terrorist group's secretary general, said in an address Aug. 17 opposing Israel's presence in Jerusalem that his group is in possession of "precision rockets" that can hit Israel. A Hezbollah attack on Israel triggered by an Israeli strike on Iran would turn "the lives of hundreds of thousands of Zionists to real hell, and we can talk about tens of thousands of dead," Associated Press reported.

More threats from Iran

In another sharp verbal attack on the Jewish state, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said that Israel's existence is an "insult to all humanity." The charge came amid open discussion by leading Israeli policymakers about whether their country should launch a preemptive strike against Iranian nuclear installations. Iran also supports terror groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah, as well as Syria's embattled Assad regime. "The Zionist regime and the Zionists are a cancerous tumor. Even if one cell of them is left in one inch of land, in the future this story will repeat," Ahmadinejad said of Israel's existence during a speech in Tehran marking Iran's Al-Quds Day, or Jerusalem Day, that was broadcast on state TV. "The nations of the region will soon finish off the usurper Zionists in the Palestinian land... A new Middle East will definitely be formed," Ahmadinejad said. "With the grace of God and help of the nations, in the new Middle East there will be no trace of the Americans and Zionists."

Rockets fired from Sinai

An Islamist terror group operating in the Sinai claimed responsibility for firing rockets into southern Israel. The Salafi Front, along with saying it fired rockets into Eilat on Aug. 15, also claimed responsibility for more than a dozen attacks on the gas pipeline between Egypt and Israel. The Salafi Front denied any connection to an Aug. 5 attack in which terrorists killed 16 Egyptian soldiers and crossed into Israel down the road from the Kerem Shalom crossing, where they were killed by Israeli security forces. The gas pipeline between Israel and Egypt has been blown up at least 14 times in the Sinai since February 2011. The Israeli army has stepped up security in the area since Egypt's revolution began last year. In addition, Israel issued a travel warning to its citizens this month regarding the Sinai. Rockets have been fired at Eilat and its environs from the Sinai several times in the past two years.

Schools make top 100

Three Israeli universities are among the top 100 institutions of higher learning in the world, according to new rankings published last week. The 10th Academic Rankings of World Universities published on Aug. 15 placed Hebrew University of Jerusalem at No. 53, four places higher than its 2011 ranking. It's the highest Israeli school on the list. The Haifa-based Technion was listed at 78, and the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot was 93rd. It was the first time either of them entered the top 100 on the ARWU list.

Peerless celebrates 22 years in the travel business

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When it comes to booking a vacation, there's a lot you can do on the Internet all by yourself. You can book through an online agency and get a pretty attractive package, including air, hotel and ground transportation.

You can even book different parts of the trip separately and create your own package. But being able to do something doesn't necessarily mean you should do it, said Ehud Telem.

Saving a few dollars does not come close to making up for the loss of personalized service, expertise and industry connections that are offered by full-service tour operators, he said.

If Telem's name is familiar to many CJN readers, it's likely because his company, Peerless Travel, has been in business 22 years, and if you've travelled to Israel, there's a good chance you went through Peerless. His company is an industry leader when it comes to putting bums in seats and sending them to Israel.

"We move about 60,000 people to places all over the world, 10,000 of them to Israel," Telem said. That's out of a total of around 75,000 Canadian passport holders who made the trip to Israel last year.

"No one is competitive on that scale," he said, not when Peerless sends 200 groups a year to the Holy Land.

Telem realizes that when he speaks about the industry, touting his own company and questioning the benefits of travelling in private groups with "charismatic" tour guides and online discounters, the suggestion will arise that he's got a personal interest he's promoting. But hear him out, he said. He has a case to make.

"It's like doing your financial statements on your own and trying to bypass the professional. In the end, it costs you more," he said.

Look at Internet booking, he said. Once you've got the tickets in hand and the arrangements are made, you're pretty much on your own. If something goes wrong – if someone at the destination goes bankrupt – good luck getting alternative arrangements or your money back, he said.

"If you go through us, you're insured, and if our end supplier goes bankrupt, they have insurance," he said.

For Internet bookings, "in 90 per cent of cases, we can do the same or better in terms of price. And we give service. They do not.

"We have tons of back doors" to contact air carriers and tour operators, to make sure things go smoothly, he said.

If your flight is cancelled or delayed, who will take care of you? If you don't like your room or your hotel, what do you do. Peerless has partners in Israel that can take care of you, he said.

Ehud Telem, the owner of Peerless Travel

You won't save much booking online, since margins in the industry are generally pretty small, he added.

"Twenty per cent of our clients are Internet casualties. They tried the Internet, and they had a bad experience. Now they're back to a full-service travel agency."

People hear about good guides by word-of-mouth, but because Peerless sends so many groups to Israel each year, it is able to hire the very best guides. Operating on the scale they do, Peerless and its partners make sure they get first access to attractions – "there's no standing in line" – and you get the best hotels and rooms from incoming tour operators, he said.

What's more, even though other guides "are as nice as they are, as knowledgeable as they are, they can't get the prices we can," and sometimes not even the kind of experiences – such as a visit to a Bedouin tent – that a larger group gets, Telem added.

So what's ahead when it comes to travel to Israel? Telem believes that market has room to grow, but slowly, even though only 20 per cent of Canadian Jews have ever visited the Holy Land.

Family tours centred on a life-cycle event, like a bar or bat mitzvah, are "once-in-a-lifetime experiences," but they're pricey and not a big part of the business, he said. He is, however, seeing more repeat business as parents travel to the Holy Land to visit children studying in yeshivot.

Still, in the last two years, Peerless has grown by 17 per cent. A part of that growth is from corporate bookings.

With 80 employees in four offices in the Toronto area and revenues in the millions, Peerless no doubt is an industry leader when it comes to full-service travel.

iPad app aids in study of Talmud

Compiled by CJN Staff

BROOKLYN, N.Y. — ArtScroll Mesorah Publications has released an iPad app for the Schottenstein Babylonian Talmud, just in time for the 13th cycle of the global Daf Hayomi (Daily Page) daily Talmud learning initiative.

Developed for offline use by a team of more than 40 scholars and technicians, ArtScroll's Schottenstein digital edition of the Talmud is said to retain the integrity of the original printed form while introducing state-of-the-art learning enhancements to deepen and broaden any Talmud learner's study.

Gedaliah Zlotowitz, ArtScroll's vice-president of sales and marketing, said, "People should understand that this is neither a scan nor a PDF of the Talmud. Each page is highly interactive in a way no print edition could be. We spared no expense in producing a quality product and made it easy to acquire with differing price packages, including a daf yomi cycle option for just a few dollars a month. You can even purchase a single blatt [page] or a few blatt if you are going on the road and don't want to carry a heavy print volume."

Users of the Talmud app can choose from three different pricing and download options available through the Apple app store, with the first seven pages given away free for users to experience the digital learning. ArtScroll reported hundreds of downloads of the app following the first hours of release on July 27.

Version 1.0 of the ArtScroll Digital Talmud contains several features. The Hebrew page of Talmud is formatted to appear similar to a print version, with its familiar signature commentary on the facing pages. However, at the press of a finger, the learner can access all the notes, including the Talmud with vowel points and commentary while never leaving the original Hebrew page.

Rabbi Mayer Pasternak, ArtScroll's technical director for the Talmud app, said, "You'll be able to hold in hand the entire Talmud – 73 volumes – in a two-pound digital tablet reader. And imagine being able to tap on a phrase in the Talmud and up pops a content box showing the Hebrew with vowel points, along with an elucidated translation and complete commentary... Students completely new to Talmud study can learn through the English section while progressively improving their Hebrew and Aramaic skills."

The ArtScroll digital Talmud does not require an active Internet connection once it is downloaded. The publishing house was sensitive to today's concerns regarding digital technology, so they worked carefully to follow the directives of leading rabbinic authorities that web devices have appropriate filters and controls.

The iPad app for the Schottenstein Babylonian Talmud is the first of several projects for development under the Wasserman Digital Initiative. ArtScroll co-founder Rabbi Meir Zlotowitz said, "Our long-term goal is to help tens of thousands of Torah learners become more proficient in the major classic sources."

Books educate children about Jewish festivals

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

I love starting out the Jewish New Year by adding to my kids' Jewish book collection. Jewish literature is a great way to educate kids about the festivals without overtly appearing to do so, and this year Kar-Ben has four new books that do just that, specifically focused on Rosh Hashanah.

In What's The Buzz by Allison Ofanansky, readers get to accompany a group of Israeli children on a visit to a bee farm. Along the way, they learn to temper their fear of being stung, and they find out how and where honey is made and extracted.

The text is accompanied by informative colour photographs that help explain pollination and give kids age three through eight an appreciation of the complex process that results in the sweet treat we enjoy on Rosh Hashanah. The book concludes with some fun facts about honey in Israel, including the fact that there are more than 90,000 beehives in the country. To make a single pound of honey, bees must collect nectar from two million flowers.

This is the third in a Jewish holiday series by Ofanansky, an American writer who made aliyah in 1996. Her previous two books, Harvest of Light and Sukkot Treasure Hunt, were named Sydney Taylor Notable Children's Books.

The Rosh Hashanah customs at my holiday table have been identical since I was old enough to remember, so I was thrilled to learn about other customs in Apples and Pomegranates: A Family Seder for Rosh Hashanah by Rahel Musleah. Musleah, an Indian Jew, reminds us that far from restricting our symbolism to apples and honey, there are other foods that are rich in meaning and tradition that we might wish to include. She discusses pomegranate, green beans, beetroot leaves, leeks and lettuce, adding a shopping list and recipe ideas for their incorporation at the Rosh Hashanah seder table.

Her recipe suggestions are practical and tasty, and for each of the ingredients she includes a prayer, a story and an activity appropriate for parents and children. Each chapter also contains a sidebar titled "Think!" wherein families can explore some of the concepts at the heart of Rosh Hashanah.

Musleah concludes with a list of the prayers to be recited at the table on the Jewish New Year, complete with Birkat Hamazon and music and lyrics for songs. She's added a couple of informative pages on New Year's food customs around the world, from the American South to China, Japan and Spain.

Apples and Pomegranates is a great resource for families looking to extend the symbols they include at their Rosh Hashanah tables and teach their children more than just the applies-and-honey basics of the holiday.

In Talia and the RUDE Vegetables by Linda Elovitz Marshall, a young girl tries to help her grandmother by digging vegetables from the garden for a Rosh Hashanah stew. Only problem is she misunderstands the instruction, and instead of "root" vegetables, hears "rude." So she finds the most twisted, ornery carrots and parsnips, figuring they must be the rude ones. Anything that looks remotely good she hands to the rabbi for redistribution to other families.

She returns to the kitchen with "rude'agabas," a terrible turnip, a lumpy bumpy potato, a garish garlic, a crooked carrot and an ornery onion. The story is comical, with cute illustrations by Francesca Assirelli.

Tashlich is a tradition rich in meaning, and in the book Tashlich at Turtle Rock, Susan Schnur, a Reconstructionist rabbi, discusses one family's exploration of the custom. "My friend Fanny who lives in New York does it in the fountain at Lincoln Center, and my brother's friend, Matt, says he once did it in a toilet," notes Annie, the protagonist. "My family has its own tradition."

That tradition involves a hike with four stops along the way, and at each stop family members contemplate their plans for the new year and the milestones, good and bad, of the year past.

"We have written this book so that your family has the confidence to add to Tashlich, too," writes Schnur, "[with] songs, a real hike and honest thoughts about yourselves at the New Year: what you're grateful for, what your last year was like, what you vow to do better in the months ahead."

It's a sweet story that inspires some thought about Tashlich and what it means to truly reflect on our behaviour and achievements.

The toddler crowd may be familiar with the Sammy Spider series of stories, which covers Pesach, Chanukah, Purim, Rosh Hashanah, Shabbat, Shavuot and Sukkot among other Jewish themes. If your children are fans, consider ordering Sammy Spider's Jewish Calendar, which comes with illustrations relevant to Jewish holidays, recipes, craft ideas and more. The glossy calendar retails for $8.95 and is a colourful, age-appropriate addition to the kitchen, bedroom or playroom.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

CHAVA ROSENFARB REMEMBERED IN TWO UPCOMING EVENTS

Famed Canadian Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb is being remembered in two upcoming events, one this week and the other in November.

The Ashkenaz Festival presents A Tribute to Chava Rosenfarb (1923-2011), directed by and featuring Theresa Tova. Others featured in the tribute are Mitch Smolkin; Rosenfarb's daughter, Goldie Morgentaler; Freydi Mrocki and Moish Kanatkin. Musicians are Henri Oppenheim, Brian Katz, Aleksandar Gajic and Bret Higgins.

Co-presented by the Committee for Yiddish and the Workmen's Circle. Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St. (parking off Wilmington). $10 at the door. See the full Ashkenaz Festival lineup at www.ashkenazfestival.com.

The Workmen's Circle has also announced it is hosting a staged reading in English of Rosenfarb's play, The Bird of the Ghetto, by the Threshold Theatre. Co-sponsors are the Committee for Yiddish and the Friends of Yiddish. Steelworker's Union Hall, 25 Cecil St. Sunday, Nov. 4, 2 p.m.

New Holocaust Art at Shaarei Shomayim: Last summer some 250 Holocaust survivors and their families contributed funds for a work of art honouring Holocaust victims for Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. A proposal from Toronto photographer-artist Yuri Dojc was chosen from 27 submissions. The result, according to a statement from the committee, "was a museum piece that not only conveyed the message of the Holocaust but was also exciting" and "of its time – the 21st century."

A three-dimensional bridge between the past and the present, Dojc's photo installation is the result of a collaboration with Israeli designer Ido Bruno. Sponsoring families are to welcome the art installation to Shaarei Shomayim at a reception on Sunday, Aug. 26, 3 p.m.

Yiddish Vinkl Presents: Described as one of the greatest living treasures of Yiddish song and language, Arkady Gendler, born in Ukraine in 1921, lost most of his family and friends in the Holocaust but never stopped singing, writing and teaching in Yiddish. He also began composing songs deemed to be of exceptional musical and poetic quality. Recently, German clarinetist Christian Dawid collected and recorded some of Gendler's work on a CD that will be officially launched at a concert at the Ashkenaz Festival, Harbourfront Centre, on Sept. 2.

Dawid also discusses the project and presents excerpts from the CD at the Yiddish Vinkl, Free Times Cafe, 320 College St. Thursday, Aug. 30, 12 noon. Buffet lunch $18. Reservations, 416-967-1078.

A cinematic ode to a master pickle maker

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Simcha Leibovich, a Romanian Jew and a Holocaust survivor, died in Montreal on Dec. 5, 2005, but his legacy as a legendary pickle maker lives on.

For close to 40 years, Leibovich, the proprietor of Simcha's Fruit Market at 3953 St. Laurent Blvd., plied his trade, satisfying the palates of gourmets and gourmands alike.

Leibovich is brought back to life, at least fleetingly, in Posthumous Pickle Party, a cinematic ode to him scheduled to be broadcast by Vision TV on Wednesday, Aug. 29, at 11 p.m.

In this poignant documentary, a group of his customers converges on Leibovich's shuttered shop to reminisce about this unobtrusive man and to sample the last remaining batch of his aromatic pickles.

The film is supplemented by clips of Leibovich and his beloved wife, Fanny, who predeceased him.

As his niece, Anne Avram, recalls, her uncle arrived in Montreal after working on a ship. He and Fanny, whom he married late in life, opened a shop at the old Rachel Market in the late 1950s and relocated to St. Laurent, two blocks away, in 1966. A tireless worker, Leibovich was at his store seven days a week and never took a vacation, probably because he and Fanny were childless. "Work is good," he says. "It's healthy."

One day, about a year after his wife's death, he failed to appear at his shop. Having taken ill, he checked himself into a hospital. He was 75 when he passed away. His niece says he was tired and wanted to sell the store.

According to a young man who appears in the film, Simcha's Fruit Market, a bare-bones operation devoid of flash or glitter, was the last vestige of Jewish St. Laurent. This is a misleading observation, but Leibovich was certainly a throwback to the days when St. Laurent was still known as St. Lawrence Blvd.

Simcha Leibovich in Simcha's Fruit Market

His wife, in file footage from the late 1990s, observes that Jewish merchants on St. Laurent have been supplanted by Italian, Portuguese and Spanish shopkeepers.

"We remained," she says.

But as the first minutes of Posthumous Pickle Party unreel, Simcha's Fruit Market remains closed, abandoned to the elements. At this point, Leibovich's army of customers, spearheaded by musician Josh Dolgin and food critic Barry Lazar, move in.

To their surprise and delight, they stumble upon barrels of pickles slathered in brine and pickled cabbage that Leibovich left behind.

"This is a serious dill pickle," Lazar states, savouring the taste. "For a foodie, this is an amazing feeling."

"I see the fields of Romania," intones Dolgin as he bites into a pickle.

Someone else offers the reflective commentary that this pickle-tasting party is akin to walking "a fine line between archeology and desecration."

In the end, the leftover pickles are sent to a deli across the street and to a soup kitchen for the homeless. In the soup kitchen, a Vietnamese Canadian employee who normally hates pickles is persuaded to try one. "Very good," she says, a big smile creasing her face.

Unfortunately, no one else will ever be able to eat a Leibovich pickle. Simcha took the recipe to his grave. But Posthumous Pickle Party leaves us with a tantalizing impression of what might have been had he still been alive and making irrepressible pickles.

Lemon Bucket Orkestra is a super party band

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

One of Toronto's liveliest party bands, the Lemon Bucket Orkestra, will be performing free at the Scotiabank BuskerFest and at the Ashkenaz Festival.

The 14-piece "Balkan-klezmer-Gypsy-punk-super-party-band" made headlines earlier this year when they played an impromptu concert aboard a delayed Air Canada flight to Romania.

Mark Marczyk and Tangi Ropars founded the band in 2010 because they were missing folk music in their lives in Toronto, along with the sense of community that they feel it brings.

"I had just spent a few years in Ukraine and was really immersed in Ukrainian folk culture, which includes klezmer and Gypsy culture. Tangi grew up playing Celtic music in the west of France," Marczyk says.

When Marczyk came back from Ukraine in 2009, he felt that mainstream music was dominating the scene, and although there were music scenes such as Small World Music and a few festivals – he was not aware of Ashkenaz at the time – he felt that no one was living this music every day.

"We are really into different types of eastern European folk," says Marczyk. "What we wanted to do is to take our favourite music from all the folk cultures and bring the energy of these cultures and then add to that western jazz and punk music and all the different influences that our members bring and embrace that. There is not really a name for that. We just lump everything together."

He said the band tries to take traditional music and rearrange it for different types of instruments. "We try to change the structure a little bit and take pieces of one thing and another and put them together. I like to think what we do with traditional music is all original."

Surprisingly, there are no Jewish members in the group. Marczyk a Catholic whose family hails from western Ukraine, was introduced to klezmer when he lived in Ukraine. He says a large part of the klezmer repertoire came from Ukraine, Moldavia and Romania, specifically the Carpathian region.

"I took part in folk-music festivals where I met bands dedicated to preserving that culture," says Marczyk. "We would swap tunes. In a lot of cases, the tunes were the same. Everybody knew each other's repertoire but would play it in a slightly different style."

The name Lemon Bucket Orkestra came from an old Odessan klezmer tune called Lemon/Cheeky. "It is slang in the Russian-speaking Jewish community for money," Marczyk says. "The song is about a hustler singing about how he makes lemons on his balcony, so because we started as a street band and busking was really important to us, we wanted to give people the opportunity to pay what they can, or not pay if they couldn't afford it. To make music as accessible as possible, we would joke that we would put our bucket out and busk for our lemons."

In 2011, Toronto filmmaker Justin Friesen made a short documentary on the band titled Let's Make Lemonade. It was accepted into Air Canada's EnRoute Festival and will be presented on board its flights in November, ironically the same time the band boards their flight for their second European tour. There's no word yet if travellers will be treated to another inflight impromptu concert after the film airs.

The Lemon Bucket Orkestra releases its first full-length CD, Lume, Lume, which means "World, World" or "People, People" in Romanian, on Sept. 21.

The Lemon Bucket Orkestra performs at the 2012 Scotiabank BuskerFest in the St. Lawrence Market neighbourhood in Toronto on Aug. 24 and 26. www.torontobuskerfest.com

They also give a free performance at Harbourfront Centre on Sept. 2, 11 p.m., as part of the 2012 Ashkenaz Festival. www.ashkenazfestival.com

Corpse Bride set to live music at Ashkenaz

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

An ancient Jewish folk tale about a man who mistakenly marries a corpse has been turned into a theatrical production that will be performed as part of this year's Ashkenaz Festival.

"It's sort of an urban legend. No one knows if it's true," said The Corpse Bride's co-producer Niki Landau. "It seemed to be absurd, but there was something interesting about it, so we started to develop it."

She originally came across the story while teaching a course at York University in 2002, and together with her husband, co-producer Paul Lampert, they developed it into a workshop production in 2007 and now into a theatrical production by their company, Theatre Panik.

The story is told as a movement piece set to live music, with an ode to traditional Yiddish theatre and German cabaret. "I learned a type of movement theatre which is quite common in Europe," Lampert said.

"In Canada, there is a much more oral tradition, so this particular style is unique. It's a cross between rhetorical gestures, as was seen in silent films, and partly mime as well, so you need really good actors for it."

The tale comes from a collection of stories about the 16th-century mystic, Rabbi Isaac Luria of Safed.

According to the tale, a man on the way to his wedding puts a ring on a branch protruding out of a forest and says the Jewish wedding vows, and is surprised when the branch turns out to be a corpse who claims they are married. The corpse fights with the man's fiancée, both determined to become his wife. The case is brought before Rabbi Luria who rules that the marriage is not valid.

"The story became more popular during the pogroms of eastern Europe in the 19th century," said Landau. "I found it interesting that it focused on women's experiences, which is hard to find."

The play festures 14 actors, including Evelyn Hart, a former prima ballerina with the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, and four live musicians. "The play asks you to think about what you do when your life doesn't work out the way you want it to or the way you thought it would be," said Landau. "It's a life question – what do you do next?"

Both producers share ties to the history of the tale. Born in Poland, Lampert was interested in the "shtetl" feel of the story. "It's a time of great innocence, and you see that exemplified by musicals like Fiddler on the Roof," said Lampert. "I wanted to explore these aspects of Jewish Yiddish theatre."

Landau's great-grandparents were from Poland and Russia, "so in a way, it's an ode to that time," she said. "I wanted to look back at that time, to see how we got to where we are today."

The story is also the basis for Tim Burton's 2005 movie Corpse Bride featuring Johnny Depp and Emma Watson, but there is no Jewish aspect incorporated in his version. "I felt like the Jewish history of the folk tale was really important," said Landau. "We wanted to preserve that."

Overall, they hope the production appeals to a diverse audience. "Everyone loves to see the problems that arise when a wedding goes wrong and that's what this is," said Landau.

The Corpse Bride plays Aug. 30, Sept. 1 and 2 at Enwave Theatre at Harbourfront Centre in Toronto. This is a ticketed event. For more information about this and other Ashkenaz events, visit www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Banned U.S tennis player restarts his career

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

American tennis player Wayne Odesnik will remember the Rogers Cup as his breakthrough tournament for 2012.

The 133rd-ranked Odesnik defeated Australian Marinko Matosevic 6-3, 6-3 and Teymuraz Gabashvilli of Russia 6-3, 5-7, 7-6(3) to go into the main draw before losing his opening-round match to Julien Benneteau of France 6-4, 6-4.

While this performance may not be particularly noteworthy, it was a significant breakthough for Odesnik, who was suspended from competing on the ATP men's tennis circuit for being in posession of human growth hormone (HGH) in 2010. For Odesnik, the Rogers Cup was his first major tennis tournament in close to a year.

"It felt wonderful to focus on tennis and let go of the past. I had fans from Toronto watching my matches and pulling for me. That has not always been the case since I resumed my career, and I feel excited and happy about playing again," he said after his loss to Benneteau.

Odesnik was charged with importing eight vials of HGH into Australia, where he had travelled to play in the 2010 Brisbane tournament. He pleaded guilty at a hearing by the International Tennis Federation anti-doping committee in March 2010. He was prohibited from entering tournaments for the next seven months and had to forfeit his ranking points and prize money ($90,000) for 2010.

At 25, Odesnik didn't want to quit and chose to rebuild his promising career. He was reinstated to the men's pro circuit in 2011. Odesnik competed in futures and challenger events (the minor leagues of pro tennis) in 2011 and won three singles titles to raise his rankings from 1,000 to be in the top 200 rankings by this past March.

Although Odesnik felt optimistic about returning to the form he showed when he had a career-high ranking of No. 77 (2009), many of his peers didn't want to see him play at all.

"What [Odesnik] did was just plain cheating, and they should throw him out of tennis. He should never have been allowed to return," American tennis star Andy Roddick said in 2010.

American player Donald Young felt that Odesnik should deserve credit for his achievements on the tennis circuit since returning from his suspension.

"I don't want to comment on whether Wayne should be allowed to compete or not. He has done well in playing up to form, and since he is allowed to compete, he should be acknowledged for his success," Young said after his Rogers Cup match in Toronto.

American Jewish tennis player Wayne Odesnik at the 2012 Rogers Cup

Odesnik feels that continuing to have good results on the court will make peers and fans alike think differently of him.

"I can't comment on my suspension or anything about the case. But I will say that if the players think they really know what happened, just talk with me, investigate the issue and don't assume. I feel like I'm having a chance again to play well and want to make the most of the opportunity."

Born is Johannesburg, South Africa, Odesnik and his parents moved to Florida when he was three. He took up tennis lessons at Miami's Jewish community centre at age six.

Because he learned to play through a JCC program, Odesnik is working on creating a foundation for promising Jewish players who may not be able to afford to go to expensive tennis academies to develop their game.

"I am fortunate that the JCC was there for me to continue to play tennis, so I'm eager to give back and help other Jewish tennis players achieve their dreams. A lot of people don't have the money to go to the expensive tennis academies, so having a Jewish sports foundation would help. I don't know yet when the foundation will begin, but I'm optimistic that I will have a lot of sponsors interesting in creating the foundation over the next year."

Odesnik's performance at the Rogers Cup will likely raise his ranking to 125 as he prepares to compete at the U.S. Open in September.

Two other Jewish players competing at the Rogers Cup, Americans Jesse Levine (who was born in Ottawa) and Michael Russell, lost their qualifying round matches.

Raonic favoured minute of silence

Canadian tennis star Milos Raonic who played at the Rogers Cup and competed at the London Olympics, spoke out against the International Olympic Committee's (IOC) decision not to have a moment of silence for the Israeli Olympians who were murdered at the 1972 Munich Games.

"I am too young to remember them personally, but I know who they [the slain Israeli athletes] were and it was disappointing not to acknowledge them at the opening ceremony," Raonic said after his Rogers Cup opening match.

Meanwhile, Canadian tennis great Lorne Main, who won what was then called the Canadian Open doubles title in 1951 and 1954, felt that American Jewish tennis great Dick Savitt, whom he competed against when Savitt won both Wimbledon and the Australian Open in 1951, was a victim of antisemitism when he was not selected to play in the Davis Cup for the United States in the 1951 final against Australia, which the Aussies won.

"Savitt was the best American player in his time and was snubbed by Davis Cup captain Frank Shields in favor of Ted Schroeder, who failed to win a match in the final. It was obvious to me, and the players of the era, that Savitt was not selected because he is Jewish," Main said. Savitt retired from competitive tennis following his exclusion from the Davis Cup team.

Main, 82, was inducted into the Rogers Cup Hall Of Fame prior to the start of the men's semifinal round. He's the world senior champion for the over-80 age group.

Toronto cantor brings Moroccan flavour to Ashkenaz

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Former Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Cantor Aaron Bensoussan said his latest musical release, A New Journey, pays homage to his rich Sephardi roots.

Although Moroccan-born Bensoussan is part of a prominent Sephardi rabbinic dynasty that dates back to Rabbi Yehuda Bensoussan, who is believed to have taught the medieval philosopher Maimonides, he has been immersed in the world of Ashkenazi chazzanut since his early teens.

As a child, Bensoussan had every intention of following in his ancestors' footsteps to become a rabbi. Bensoussan's father taught him about the art of Sephardi liturgical music and poetry, and he also studied with prominent Moroccan musicians.

But when he moved to New York at the age of 13, enrolled in yeshiva and was exposed to the cantorial music of Yossele Rosenblatt, he knew he wanted to be a chazzan.

"Even though it was a different culture, the Jewish neshamah [soul] is the same," Bensoussan said.

"The Jewish cry inside of the heart is the same, but I knew that it was a challenge because one culture is falafel and hummus, and the other is herring. Two different worlds. But I was intrigued by this cantorial art. It seeped into my soul and I wanted to know more about it, and it eventually became the work of my life."

Bensoussan has since served as cantor at three North American synagogues, and two years ago, he ended an 11-year stint at Beth Emeth.

Cantor Aaron Bensoussan said his latest music pays tribute to his Sephardi roots.

"I wanted to be more independent. I wanted to make the world more of a stage for me," said Bensoussan about his departure from the shul.

He said working at the synagogue meant he had to cater to the needs of many others.

"We had 1,400 families and I couldn't do a lot of what I had inside of me... As I was doing the cantorial work, I was missing my background," he said.

"It was like a void because [the Ashkenazi style] was not totally home for me."

Although Bensoussan said he is grateful for the years he spent as a cantor, he's looking forward to the opportunity to pursue his latest musical passion.

"I remember one time in the middle of a prayer, I caught myself in a flamenco mode – a real Moroccan, Tangiers, Spanish sound. And it sounded so wonderful. I was intrigued. I tried it another week and another week, and I found that the synagogue was very warm to it because it was something real that came out of this combination," he said.

"Now I'm coming back to my piyutim [liturgical poems] and to what I grew up with. I've missed it so much that I'm really finding the love again."

At 58, Bensoussan said his career has come full circle and feels it's never too late to start on a new path, or a new journey, as his latest album suggests.

"I'm a bit nervous [about starting over] but it's a good adrenaline. Part of performing is the nerves that go with it," he said.

He'll be launching the album with a performance at the Ashkenaz Festival on Sept. 2 with a band from New York directed by Adam Morrison.

The annual Ashkenaz Festival is North America's largest festival of Yiddish and Jewish culture and runs from Aug. 28 until Sept. 3 at Toronto's Harbourfront Centre.

"What is interesting and great about the festival is that even though it's called Ashkenaz, it features many Sephardi acts, like Yemen Blues," he said.

He said he's looking forward to promoting his latest CD, which he described as very unusual.

It contains 11th- and 12th-century poetry and prayers set to music that Bensoussan wrote.

"I wanted to use the poems in my own way. I wrote music to the poetry of these great sages. I used the influence of blues – Moroccan music is very influenced by blues," he said.

He credited a father-son jazz duo he worked with, Jaroslav and Daniel Jakubovic, for the album's distinct sound.

"Daniel brought the young side to it, and his father brought the jazz element. I brought in the Middle Eastern and cantorial element. The combination of these three elements is what made this record."

Toronto musician wins international singing contest

By Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

Toronto's Evan Malach is the new "Jewish star" after winning the Hallelujah Global Hebrew Singing Contest for Jewish Talent finals Saturday night in Israel. Malach topped the voting with his rendition of Ehud Banai's K'nani Blues.

"I feel incredibly humbled. The talent of the group was at an extremely high level. To be chosen as the winner is such an honour," Malach said in an interview the day after his win.

Of the 14 finalists, two were Canadian.

Winnipeg's Alex Dashefsky, who came in second in the Audience Favourite voting on Facebook, was really excited on being told he had made it to the finals a week earlier.

"I didn't expect to make the finals. I was quite honoured," Dashefsky, 18, told The Canadian Jewish News. "It's a great feeling."

One of the youngest contestants in the contest, Dashefsky said he felt "intimidated at first" by the other participants as some of them were "quite professional." But the University of Manitoba freshman, who will begin his studies next month, quickly showed that he was a singing force himself.

Both Malach and Dashefsky beat out hundreds of other Jewish singers from across the globe to secure their spots in the finale.

Some 1,000 people watched the Saturday night showdown in Ramat Hasharon, along with Sports and Culture Minister Limor Livnat and Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz.

"Hebrew song is the most beautiful, powerful and essential part of renewed Jewish culture. There is nothing more important than an evening like this that connects the Diaspora to Israel," Steinitz told the crowd.

Malach won a cash prize of $8,000, the opportunity to record a radio single with Israeli cantor and stage performer Dudu Fisher (which will be released as a single in Israel and on global Jewish radio stations), and a singing tour that will see him perform at Jewish communities across the globe.

Second-place winner Courtney Simmons of the United States won a cash prize of $4,000. Third-place winner was Russia's Polina Zizak, who took home $2,000.

The 27-year-old Malach said both before the finals and afterward that the level of talent among the contestants was "exceptional."

"To give you a sense of how amazing the people in the group are," he said, "[Simmons] has performed on Broadway and [Zizak] has been accepted to study voice at one of Russia's premier music conservatories. I am thrilled, to say the least, and so grateful for the opportunity to connect with such wonderful and passionate people."

Evan Malach won the Hallelujah Global Hebrew Singing Contest for Jewish Talent.

The Hallelujah contest brings Jewish singers age 18 to 30 to Israel for a one-month experience that includes music training and learning about Israeli heritage and culture.

The idea for the song contest was conceived by the Meitar Association for Fostering Hebrew Songs among the Jewish People, whose aim is to create a cultural dialogue between Israel and the Diaspora.

Hundreds of people applied to take part in the summer program. Participants had to pass three stages – sending YouTube videos of them singing Hebrew songs – before being selected. Only 30 of the applicants were chosen to come to Israel.

"This is like the Jewish Olympics for singing," Malach said of the experience. "It's already given me 30 really close friends from around the world – people from South America, Russia, Uruguay, Australia, Argentina, the U.S. and Canada."

There was no specific daily schedule for all the contestants. Some days the participants were taken on tours of Israel – Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, the Dead Sea. Other days, they met with Israeli musicians and producers for Hebrew pronunciation and interpretation of songs, rehearsals and group activities.

"The people here are world class. That's probably the best thing. Just being able to play music with these Israeli musicians has been a highlight for me," said Malach, who already has two albums on the market and is planning to record a third with Israeli musicians.

Of the 30 semifinalists, 14 participants were chosen to be in the finals.

Dashefsky sang Arik Einstein's Oof Gozal in the finals.

"I grew up listening to Israeli music my entire life," he said, adding that he understands the words and feels "a connection to Israel and Hebrew."

Malach looked at it somewhat differently. "Music is universal. I feel like beyond the language, you can feel something from a song even if you don't know what the words mean," Malach said. "Having said that, I did learn Hebrew throughout my formative years at Leo Baeck [Day School] and CHAT [the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] in Toronto, so I can tap into the meaning of the song."

The final contest, which was broadcast live in Israel and streamed online for the global audience, gave the contestants a real audience in front of which to perform.

"Hallelujah is a new calling card. As opposed to being just another Jewish singer, I have 'Hallelujah winner' under my belt," Malach said. "I hope that this development will lead to future opportunities performing in front of Jewish audiences around the world. I also hope that the victory will lead to progress with my [original rock musical sInagogue- The Shul of Rock]. Ideally, it will be easier to open doors to producers and other theatre and entertainment professionals around the world looking to collaborate on exciting and original material."

Series promotes sustainable business practices

Have you considered idea-sharing and networking as a way to help make the world a more sustainable place?

Brad Zarnett is the founder of the Toronto Sustainability Speaker Series (TSSS), a live and online community that celebrates sustainability innovation and leadership. Launched in 2008, TSSS dispels the myth that sustainability is a cost to for-profit and not-for-profit business, and shares the stories of companies and organizations that have found economic advantage by embracing sustainability.

TSSS holds events six to eight times a year. They are a learning opportunity and a networking forum to promote sustainable business practices.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Zarnett's series is one of the only efforts I've come across in the Toronto area that combines physical meetings and extensive use of social media to share ideas and quantified results from action taken to reduce an organization's impact on the environment. Nearly 2,300 people belong to the TSSS group on LinkedIn, where they engage in discussions.

I recently met Zarnett for lunch to better understand what drives him. "We live in a world where resources are increasingly scarce... [and] our climate is changing. Individual efforts at recycling and reduced consumption can only go so far. Business holds tremendous power – corporations have great potential to help us tread more softly upon our Earth," he said.

Zarnett sees real opportunity for the Canadian Jewish community to show greater leadership toward a more sustainable world. "We can drive change through the businesses we operate, the schools our kids attend and the synagogues," he said. "Judaism and environmental ethics have long been in harmony. Respect for the natural world is firmly rooted in our traditional texts."

The biggest challenge for sustainability is that most people are neither prepared nor supported in their organizations to think innovatively. Old-style thinking focuses on quarterly results instead of assessing long-term impacts and possibilities. Zarnett is eager for the day when it becomes the community norm to focus on energy "consumption" rather than "expense." He sees change in mindset as the foundation of a new way of seeing opportunities rather than limitations. Zarnett feels that for true change to happen, organizations must be offered direct incentives (for example, through government initiatives), and/or visionary leaders must inspire real change. With visionary leadership, a new culture becomes embedded in all aspects of the organization: business managers and community leaders understand that not having a holistic approach is unacceptable, while employees and volunteers learn that innovative out-of-the-box thinking is the new norm.

"Organizations that develop a culture of problem solving and support unconventional thinking will be best suited to thrive in the sustainability era. The real winners will be the ones who develop the human capital both within their organization and in their stakeholder community," Zarnett said. "That human capital will present itself as sustainability change agents who will identify, imagine and implement the solutions needed to ensure more sustainable – and successful - operations." Perhaps some of these organizations would benefit by participating in TSSS. For more information, visit www.ecoopportunity.net.

APPLE NOODLE KUGEL

3 lg eggs
1/2 stick unsalted butter, melted & cooled
1/2 c sugar, divided
1 tsp grated lemon zest
1/4 tsp grated nutmeg
1 1/2 lb. (about 3) Gala apples, peeled & coarsely grated
5 oz. (4 c) fine egg noodles

Accompaniment: sour cream

Preheat oven to 425°F with rack in upper third. Coat a 1 1/2-qt shallow baking dish with cooking spray or butter. Whisk together eggs, butter, 7 tbls. sugar, zest, and nutmeg in a large bowl until well combined; stir in apples. Cook noodles in a large pot of salted boiling water until al dente, about 5 min. Drain noodles, toss well with apple mixture. Spread in baking dish ; sprinkle with remaining tablespoon sugar. Bake kugel until top is golden, about 30 min. Cool 5 min.

American tennis player Wayne Odesnik will remember the Rogers Cup as his breakthrough tournament for 2012. The 133rd-ranked Odesnik defeated Australian Marinko Matosevic and Teymuraz Gabashvilli of Russia to go into the main draw before losing his opening-round match to Julien Benneteau of France.

For the third consecutive year, Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer, left, lost in the first round of the Rogers Cup to a player ranked below her. Peer was upset by up-and-coming 18-year-old Eugenie Bouchard of Westmount, before a partisan crowd favouring Bouchard at Uniprix Stadium in Montreal.

Israel's Paralympians go for London gold

Aaron Kalman
The Times of Israel

With Israel's Olympic delegation back in the country, the country's medal hopes have turned to its Paralympic team.

The team will participate in the 2012 London Paralympics, opening on Aug. 29 and closing Sept. 9.

"We have a lot of spirit. We will do our best and try to return with the gold medal," sailor Dror Cohen told Army Radio last week. Cohen and his two sailing partners won gold at the Beijing Games in 2008 and hope to repeat their achievement.

Handcyclist Nati Gruberg, who cited cyclist Lance Armstrong as his inspiration, said that making the competition was an achievement. After being injured in a motorcycle accident and spending two years in the hospital, Gruberg was ranked seventh in the world in handcycling.

The cyclist said he is "very proud to represent Israel," especially since there were "no regular people" who cycled for the country at the Summer Olympic Games. "I will try to get the honours for everybody."

Team members last week met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who wished them luck in the upcoming competition. Netanyahu told the athletes that two months with a cast on his leg had helped him understand the difficulties of a physical handicap "just a little bit more."

He couldn't imagine the willpower and prowess they constantly had to call upon, he said, after he was forced to think twice about showering with his broken leg.

The Israeli delegation consists of 25 people, seven of them women, who are set to compete in nine events: sailing, wheelchair tennis, sharpshooting, marathon, handcycling, table tennis, swimming, riding and rowing.

Sharpshooter Doron Shaziri is one of the team's more decorated members with six Paralympic medals. This summer he hopes to win his first Paralympic gold. "It's coincidence that I haven't won gold... yet," he told the Israeli sporting site One. The same competitors attend every international competition, he said, noting that he won gold at the European and world championships.

The Ramat Gan resident was injured by a landmine at the age of 20 and had his leg amputated below the knee.

At the 1996 Games in Atlanta, he won two silver medals, and in the following two Paralympics, he added three bronze and another silver to his shelf. "It's a question of timing," Shaziri said, of winning the ultimate prize. "You have to bring yourself to the peak at the right moment, and that's what I've been training for."

Culture and Sports Minister Limor Livnat told the Paralympic team that they "do amazing things and... act as role models."

She said her office is trying to increase its support of the team, as Israel tries to bridge the gap between the able-bodied and disabled in all fields.

Community Focus

The Canadian Jewish news

Section B

Community is made up of individuals

A community is made up of both people and institutions. In this Community Focus supplement, we look at some of the individuals who are part of the Toronto-area Jewish community. They represent a range of ages, and ethnic and geographic backgrounds.

Kitty Cohen, 99, is the most senior participant in this year's Shoppers Drug Mart Weekend to End Women's Cancers. She plans to complete the 30-kilometre walkers' route on the second day of the weekend. Her secret to staying fit? Among her other activities, she tap dances.

Moshe Modiera, the 30-year-old son of an Ethiopian kess (Jewish spiritual leader), may not have the typical "Jewish look," according to CJN reporter Sheri Shefa. But, she adds, he is "a good reminder of the true diversity of Toronto's Jewish community." A managing partner for a clothing company, Modiera has worked with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as well as Hillel. He moved here at age 8 with his family, and Ohr Somayach in Thornhill helped them settle in.

Editorial

Erin Kleinberg, 26, and Stephanie Mark, 27, are childhood friends who met at summer camp. Last year, they created the style website The Coveteur, forging a new path in the fashion world.

We also look at new rabbinic leaders of three synagogues and how their congregations are evolving as a result of their being there.

Rabbi Rafi Lipner (the founder of The House, and now the spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation) is described as warm and engaging, with a belief in "community-inspired Judaism," while Rabbi Daniel Korobkin brings a California sensibility and openness to his congregants at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Rabbi Micah Streiffer brings his views of community, and synagogue as a place where Jews can be themselves, to Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill. His outlook was shaped by his experiences growing up in the American South.

But as diverse as the Jewish community is, we are all connected.

Caterers also walking the walk

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Rose Reisman Catering and Pickle Barrel Restaurants have joined forces to serve 20,000 meals to the more than 4,000 walkers taking part in The Weekend to End Women's Cancers on Sept. 8 and 9.

Reisman and Peter Higley, president and CEO of Pickle Barrel, are the official caterers for the weekend, plus honorary chairs of their individual teams.

Reisman said she "couldn't be happier to be participating in this year's weekend. I know how important the research conducted by Princess Margaret Hospital is in support of a cure to end women's cancers."

She donated healthy lunches for last year's walk, she said, and decided to make it an ongoing commitment. "I have seen [women and families] struggle with women's cancers and it concerns me.

"I believe that eating healthy and living well can reduce risks. A better life might prevent diseases."

She is also participating in the walk herself, and her team of 22 walkers has raised $35,000 so far. Higley is part of a Pickle Barrel team, which will match whatever Reisman raises.

Reisman will be walking with her 28-year-old daughter, "who taught me that wrapping your toes and heels with duct tape helps prevents blisters. That was my major concern about the walk."

99-year-old gets 'up and out' to end cancer

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Kitty Cohen turns 100 years old in December, she wants balloons to fly and her dancing shoes close by.

"I want to be effervescent, and do my jig, my jive and my jazz," says Cohen, who has been dancing since she was nine years old.

Before that big event, however, Cohen, who was born in Midland, Ont. and now lives in the Terraces of Baycrest, is taking part in Shoppers Drug Mart Weekend to End Women's Cancers, Sept. 8 and 9, benefiting the Campbell Family Institute at Princess Margaret Hospital.

She began participating in the walk five years ago, she said, in order to join her daughter, Bernice Riley. "The year before, I [had] greeted her at Downsview Park at the end of the walk, and I decided that I would take part the next year.

"I went into it for the exercise, but then I appreciated how much they need the money. I walked both days the first year, and one day each year after that. Last year I walked 20 kilometres."

Cohen, a mother, grandmother and great-grandmother who has been a widow since 1975, said she gave a speech at a recent Shoppers Drug Mart event, and told the group that "aside from [the walk] being great for the lungs and great for the ticker, [it] is very important to me because it raises money [for] research, and research conquers cancer.

"Each and every walker is a vital part of this effort. I implore every able bodied male and female to join me," she said in her speech.

In an interview at Cohen's apartment, Riley said that the only reason it takes them longer to complete the walk than other walkers is because everyone stops them along the way.

"They make very kind remarks, and they tell my mother that she is an inspiration."

Cohen said that as of this interview, she had raised $1,000 for the walk. "I walk up and down the stairs in my building, knocking on people's doors, and I ask them to sponsor me. When friendly people hand me cheques, I'm so happy."

She said that keeping active is not new to her. "I was moving from day one. If not my feet, than my hands and my brain. I do crossword puzzles and I'm always looking for a Scrabble [partner]. I read the dictionary to find new Scrabble words. I also love reading The CJN, and I enjoy biographies. I just read about Napoleon."

She always worked, she said, "and when I retired from my job as a legal secretary at 62, I joined a dance troupe at the JCC.

"I became an entertainer, and we danced at hospitals and senior centres. I kept that up for 35 years and I still dance three times a week. I do square dancing, tap dancing and folk dancing. There is no better way to live your life than to swing and sway. I always keep going. If my back hurts I do some yoga and the pain subsides. I don't give in."

She said that when she was "95 or 97" a couple from Belgium saw her dancing on You Tube, and were so inspired they came to meet her. "I spent the day with them, and they brought me flowers."

When people ask her secret, she said, "I tell them 'don't sit on your fanny. Get up and out of that chair.'"

Cohen said that her life has been blessed. "Every morning I thank God for another day, and I ask him to look after my family, and everyone else in the world. I have to do that, because I am the survivor."

Beth Lida synagogue turns 100

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Gerald Litowitz still clearly remembers his bar mitzvah at Beth Lida Synagogue 63 years ago. "I remember them throwing nuts at me, and I had to duck," he said, laughing, as he recalled the memorable day.

At that time, Beth Lida was located on Augusta Avenue in Kensington Market, where many Jewish immigrants once settled. Now, the shul is in Forest Hill, and this year, it is celebrating 100 years of history.

Beth Lida's roots go back to the city of Lida, now a part of Belarus. Lida's large Jewish community, dating back to the mid-16th century, was threatened by the German invasion in World War I, and then all but eradicated in World War II.

Members of the community who had fled to Canada before the wars to escape rising antisemitism in the 19th and early 20th centuries, eventually settled in Toronto. In 1912, they founded Beth Lida's first predecessor, Shearith Israel Anshe Lida Synagogue on Terauley Street (now Bay Street), in the city's downtown core. Litowitz's family was among the founders.

As the congregation grew, the shul was moved to a frame cottage on Augusta Avenue – the same small synagogue where Litowitz fondly remembers being pelted with nuts and sweets in the winter of 1949.

"It was like a home away from home because most of the people there were relatives," he said of the atmosphere at the shul. The community became larger and more organized, purchasing a cemetery on Roselawn Avenue and establishing a Jewish learning group, a chevra kadisha, a group to visit the sick and another for collecting tzedakah.

"It was pretty active, considering it was a small synagogue," Litowitz said. Often, congregants would gather in his aunt's nearby store after services, because the synagogue didn't have a social hall at the time.

As the Jewish community in Toronto continued to move further north, Beth Lida made the move, too. In the early 1950s the community bought a church on Gilgorm Road in Forest Hill and converted it into today's Beth Lida Forest Hill Synagogue.

Beth Lida Forest Hill Synagogue
[Malka Wolman photo]

Because the building wasn't originally built as a synagogue, the Aron Kodesh faces west, instead of east toward Jerusalem, but Beth Lida's leadership was sure to seek rabbinical approval. As the synagogue's website says, this unique feature gives the building "character."

Litowitz is still a proud member of the shul. "My bloodline is attached to it, it's my history."

Today, the congregation is only about 55 families strong, but continues to hold regular Shabbat and holiday services. Although it may be small, according to president Simone Sherman it more than makes up for its size with its enthusiastic and inviting congregation.

Gerald Litowitz

"It's a small synagogue and every member counts," Sherman said, adding that the small community gives members the opportunity to be truly involved in creating and participating in shul programs. "If you want to do something in this shul, you can do it," she said.

Because the synagogue does not have a full-time rabbi, it relies on its active congregation and on guest rabbis to lead services and deliver sermons each week.

Earlier this summer, Beth Lida held a celebration for its 100th birthday. Families paraded through the streets of Forest Hill with klezmer musicians and a new sefer Torah, donated to mark the important anniversary.

During the celebration, the sofer who wrote the Torah invited men of the congregation to participate by placing their hands upon his as he wrote the last few words of the scroll.

"It was fantastic," Litowitz said of the celebration. The shul's 100th birthday is an important milestone in a history that is intertwined with his family's heritage.

Litowitz is happy to see Beth Lida keeping alive many traditions of the original congregation. No larger synagogue can replace his feeling of community from Beth Lida, even after so many years. "It gives you a very warm feeling, like being in a cocoon."

Student entrepreneur cleans up for the summer

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Noam Slodovnick, 16, hasn't decided yet what he would like to study in university or the type of career he wants to pursue, but this summer he's getting a taste of what it's like to run his own business.

The Yeshivat Or Chaim student, who will enter Grade 11 in September, was among the youngest students to receive a grant this year from an Ontario Ministry of Economic Development and Innovation program called Summer Company, which encourages students to run their own summer businesses.

The program is open to students age 15 to 29. Applicants are required to submit a business plan as part of the application process.

Of the 778 students who applied this year, 480 individuals took part in the program and launched their own businesses (one student per business). Of those, 67 were in Toronto.

Slodovnick, whose only related experience was going door-to-door to shovel snow, decided to start a business power-washing decks and outdoor furniture. He named his company Panoma Services – a word made from the first two letters of his name, and of his two brothers' names, an idea his mother came up with.

He hired his friend and fellow Or Chaim student, Yaakov Spivak, 15, to work with him, and used part of his grant money – $830 out of a possible $1,500 – to buy a pressure washer and a wagon to carry it in.

Originally, Slodovnick planned to stick to pressure washing, but found that customers were also interested in having their cars cleaned out and their windows washed. "You need to adapt," he said.

The program includes meetings with business mentors, documentation of hours and finances, and the submission of a written report at the end of the summer. Participants and mentors discuss "how we're doing, what challenges we face and what we've learned," Slodovnick said.

He added that he's learned a lot about how to deal with people and think on his feet.

Spivak said that "so many things pop up, you have to learn on the spot."

Summer Company requires a minimum of 35 hours a week on the job, and because the boys don't work on Shabbat, their hours are spread over Sunday to Friday.

The program ends Aug. 20. Upon successful completion, Slodovnick and other business owners will receive up to $1,500 each to add to their profits.

Fifty-three years in special education

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The woman behind the Merle Levine Academy – a private school for students with learning difficulties – traces her interest in special education back to 1959, the year she began teaching for the Toronto Board of Education.

In an interview in her office, adorned with family pictures and artwork on the wall, school director Merle Langbord Levine reminisced about her first teaching job at Palmerston Public School.

A neophyte teacher at the time, she was 20 years old and fresh out of teachers college. Her class consisted of 42 Grade 2 students, 17 of whom were in a "bottom" reading group.

"By the end of June, every bloody one of them was reading," Levine said, stressing the adjective that reflected her determination, and laughed, delighted with her success. "I found that my forte was with the kids who had more difficulties."

Recently, Levine, 73, was recognized by the Council for Exceptional Children for her ongoing commitment to educational excellence.

Her school, located in a building on Dufferin Street in the northern part of the city, is 7,200 square feet with brightly coloured walls, plants, aquariums and bookshelves. Classes run from elementary through high school grades, and cover areas from social skills to more conventional academic subjects.

Levine, a first-generation Canadian, grew up in a multi-generational household in Toronto. Her grandparents were founders of the Workmen's Circle, and her father, Karl, a jobber, ran Camp Yungvelt. Emma Goldman was a family friend who lived in the Langbord home for a while. Levine was told the famous anarchist, who died the year after she was born, held her when she was a baby.

"It was an interesting household, very cultured, not affluent by any means, but we lived very nicely," Levine said.

Merle Levine

Her future career was apparent to her by the time she was only three or four: she knew she wanted to be a teacher, she said.

Levine spent the first few years of her career at Toronto public schools before turning to private tutoring and her own university education while raising her two daughters. She also taught at two Jewish day schools, United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy) and Associated Hebrew Schools, before venturing out on her own.

It was at Associated that she first heard the term "perceptual learning disability" to explain the issues facing some of her students.

Now a grandmother of four teenagers, Levine started working on her BA at York University in her mid-20s. It took her 23 years to complete. "I didn't give up," she said.

In 1992, she graduated with her Master of Education degree in learning disabilities, also at York. By that time, her daughters were in university too.

A one-time itinerant "specific learning disability" teacher for the Toronto Board, Levine turned non-readers into readers by breaking down skills and teaching students one-on-one. Because of her success, it was suggested to her that she open her own clinic. "It was like an epiphany," she said.

Her first venture on her own was the Toronto Learning Centre (TLC), which she opened with a partner in a 1,000-square-foot space at Lawrence Ave. and Avenue Road in 1974. She believes it was among the first of its kind in Canada.

It grew so quickly, it "literally exploded," she said. Six months after the TLC opened, there was a strike at the North York Board of Education, and "we were just inundated."

Schools started referring students, and Levine's husband, Andy, helped with the business aspects of the learning centre. By the end of the first year, she said, parents were asking her to open a school of her own.

The TLC Day School opened with three classrooms, and moved to a 26,000-square-foot space at 3080 Yonge Street once it outgrew its original modest location.

In 1982, two years after her business partner bought her out, Levine opened the Canadian Heritage School in partnership with a psychologist. It ran until 1994, the same year Levine's husband died at age 56.

The couple had a long history: they first met when Levine was nine years old. Andy was the new boy in her class, a Hungarian war orphan who had just moved to Canada, and their teacher selected her to be his helper. She met him again as a teenager, and they married the day after her 21st birthday.

After he died, Levine opened the Merle L. Levine Academy, building it up from six students to its current 60.

To succeed in special education, Levine believes educators "have to have a lot of patience. You have to like the kids, and you have to really know how to break down a skill. You have to really have a calling to teach... If you have to stand on your head to find what way is best to teach a child a skill, that's what you have to do."

Collector specializes in WWII comic books

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Luridly illustrated, flamboyantly written and printed on easily frayed paper, American comic books published during World War II are now considered valuable artifacts of a bygone and perhaps heroic era.

No one knows that better than Gerald Hartman, a local collector who specializes in what he describes as "war propaganda" comic books.

"I collect comics that helped influence public opinion in America," said Hartman. "They helped turn public opinion in the United States from a very isolationist stance to one where the Axis powers, Nazi Germany, fascist Italy and Japan, were believed to be evil and America's enemy."

Gerald Hartman

Warming to this theme, he observed, "This form of war propaganda was necessary because, prior to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, many people in America believed that the war in Europe was not their concern."

But thanks in part to the subliminal influence of comic book superheroes such as Captain America and The Destroyer, who were dreamed up by a band of Jewish artists working out of New York City, the tide of American public opinion turned against the Axis powers.

"In effect, Jewish artists and writers played a role in convincing Americans to side with the Allies," said Hartman, pointing out that 25 million comic books were published each month during the war years and that some of them were exclusively dedicated to advancing the Allied cause.

Jewish American comic book writers and artists were determined to push the United States into the war, if only to rescue European Jews from the jaws of death, said Hartman, a child of Holocaust survivors.

In his view, they succeeded in persuading legions of Americans that there was a moral necessity in defeating Germany and its allies.

"They convinced people that there was a right and a wrong," said Hartman, noting that Michael Chabon's Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay, addressed this theme.

Hartman, president of True North Imaging, Canada's largest private medical imaging company, specializes in war propaganda comics because they speak to his heart.

"I find them very meaningful," he said, explaining that his parents were Hungarian and Slovakian Holocaust survivors. "Ultimately, you collect what fascinates and inspires you. My desire to focus on this period is the direct result of being the child of survivors."

A 55-year-old former lawyer, he has been a comic book aficionado since his youth, when his collection consisted mainly of superhero, science fiction and horror titles.

Hartman started the collection with his twin brother, Alex, and at one point, they had anywhere from 8,000 to 10,000 comics. They stopped collecting comics when other interests intervened, but returned to them upon becoming fathers.

"We wanted to introduce our children to an art form we had enjoyed very much and to an epoch we appreciated."

To Hartman, World War II seemed like a simpler age, at least in retrospect. Black and white issues were clearly understood and resolved, while issues revolving around character and values were commonly addressed by comic book writers and artists.

Hartman began amassing his current collection of 250 wartime comics almost 20 years ago, buying them online through auctions or from private dealers.

Since some of his comics are extremely rare, he stores them in sealed plastic holders, never even opening them.

Although his collection is impressive, it remains incomplete. "I've got most of what I want," he said. "I don't have very much more to collect."

An object of his desire is the very first edition of Captain America, and he hopes to acquire it very soon.

Hartman's collection is in very good, if not excellent, condition, like the originals that rolled off the presses with a roar in the 1940s.

"Many comic books, due to wartime shortages, were printed on poor-quality paper. So it's rare to find copies in really great shape, or in newsstand mint condition."

To his regret, none of his children, all in their 20s, have shown an interest in his hobby. But two of his brother's children have taken to it.

At this juncture, Hartman does not know what he will do with his collection in the future, but he may yet heed the advice of friends and colleagues who have suggested that it should be donated to a museum or an educational institution.

"I may simply decide to do that."

Journeys to Judaism: two stories

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Jenn Soer feels she is "more spiritual" as a result of her conversion to Judaism last year. She wears a silver Hamsa necklace that was a gift from her Israeli mother-in-law when she converted, and she has a particular affinity for Shabbat and Israel, which she visited for the first time last year.

But, because of her Chinese heritage, the 29-year-old preschool teacher – as she puts it herself – stands out in a Jewish crowd.

"I'm okay with that," she said over coffee near the Toronto condo she shares with her husband, Michael, and their two-year-old daughter, Abbie.

But she admits that it "sort of stung" that she was mistaken for Abbie's nanny while out with some of her Orthodox friends.

Overall, though, she said her experience has been positive.

A second-generation Canadian who grew up in Toronto, Soer met Michael six years ago through a mutual friend. He was born in Toronto, moved to Israel at age five, and lived there through elementary school.

Jenn and Michael Soer with daughter Abbie at a family wedding

Four years into their relationship, Jenn became pregnant with Abbie, the catalyst for attending conversion classes with Rabbi Wayne Allen. But the couple had already discussed conversion, and "we knew this would be part of our plan," said Jenn, who grew up without religion, aside from family gatherings for Christmas.

Her decision to convert was not only for Abbie, but "for us, too, as a family," she said.

She and Abbie were converted together last year by the Conservative movement's beit din. She recalls being nervous. "That was hard, but we got through it."

Having open-minded parents, and in-laws who have been "wonderful – very open and accepting right from day one," has made things easier for her, she said.

She enjoys Shabbat dinners at her in-laws' home with Michael's family. "I love the idea of Shabbat... I think without having our Shabbat dinners, we wouldn't see each other all the time, and I love that for Abbie."

Soer learned to read Hebrew as part of her conversion class, and was glad that her first trip to Israel followed her conversion, because she "felt more connected."

Michael speaks to Abbie, who attends a Hebrew-language daycare, mostly in Hebrew, and Jenn is still learning the language. "I feel I can understand a fair bit," she said, "[but] I have a difficult time stringing my sentences together."

Sometimes, she said, people ask questions about her Jewish observance – why she keeps kosher, for example. Her simple answer is, "I want to. It's part of my life."

Gina Zur, a friend of Soer's whose family background is Korean, is a mother of three children – Eitan, 6; Yael, 4; and Elad, 2 – and she is also married to an Israeli.

The 30-something Torontonian, who has lived here all her life, was raised Catholic and educated in a Catholic elementary school.

She met her husband, Gidi, in 2000, and they dated, but he told her "it could never get serious" because she wasn't Jewish. His family is "traditional, but not Orthodox," she said.

Although she wasn't ready to convert and at one point the couple broke up, Gina began to research Judaism to learn more about it.

"After a while, we decided together that we would speak to a rabbi," she said.

'You need a lot of support from your friends'

Among her reasons for deciding to convert, she wanted to have only one religion in her future home. As well, she said, "I truly believed the beliefs, [and] loved the family time the holidays brought."

They approached rabbis from the Reform, Conservative and Orthodox movement, and began to take conversion classes together through the Conservative movement, although ultimately she opted for an Orthodox conversion.

They began to observe Shabbat and kashrut, and at the end of the year-long course, she was "ready to take it to the next level," she said, referring to Orthodoxy.

As well, she added, because she and her children don't "look Jewish," she didn't want there to be any question about their Judaism.

Before her 2003 conversion, Zur studied with an Orthodox woman for a year to learn about the Orthodox approach to aspects of Judaism, including niddah (family purity laws), Shabbat and kashrut. As well, she studied Hebrew with a private tutor.

The most challenging part was giving up her previous lifestyle and adjusting to a new reality with her family, she said. Her grandmother, who always enjoyed cooking for her, "didn't really understand why I wasn't able to eat her food any more."

As well, Gina felt a bit lost at first in an Orthodox shul, without Gidi beside her during the service. However, she added, "A lot of the women were very welcoming."

The couple have since become involved at the Jewish Russian Community Centre. "It's been a change for him, too," she said of her husband.

Gina Zur, left, with husband Gidi and children Yael, Elad and Eitan

For her, becoming Jewish was "a new start.

"It's not easy. It's very emotional, especially during the [non-Jewish] holidays. You need a lot of support from your friends and family. My friends and family supported me a lot."

New spiritual leaders make their marks on shuls

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

How does a congregation evolve when a new rabbi takes over as spiritual leader?

In a number of Toronto synagogues, new rabbis are putting their own stamp on their respective congregations. We look at two congregations where new rabbis are marking the end of their first year, and a third where the associate rabbi has just become the spiritual leader.

Common threads include approachability on the part of the rabbis, and what one shul president described as a "positive vibe" in his congregation.

A June 2012 press release from Temple Kol Ami, announcing the appointment of the Thornhill synagogue's new director of education, described the congregation as being "rejuvenated" – at least in part – by the arrival of Rabbi Micah Streiffer last year.

Rabbi Micah Streiffer

The Louisiana native – who speaks without a drawl because he lived in Denver for five years as a child – told The CJN that his goal over the past year has been to engage the 170-family Reform congregation "as much as possible, and in as many different ways as possible." He cited worship, study, children, social action, and particularly music, as entry points to Judaism.

Kathy Stein, the synagogue's president, noted that Kol Ami has always been a "musical" synagogue, an area of common ground for Rabbi Streiffer and his congregants.

She added that he has endeared himself to them by not just embracing his new community, but "reveling" in it. He knows everyone's name and makes congregants feel welcome, she said.

As well, Stein added, "He enjoys learning, and it's infectious. He loves to teach, and loves to learn."

The rabbi, who grew up in an actively Reform family, decided as an adult to enter rabbinical school because it would allow him "to be a teacher, work with people, and make music, and to do those things in a Jewish context. That's what I love about being a rabbi. I get to do all my favourite things, and I get to do them Jewishly."

Among his initiatives at Kol Ami, the 33-year-old father of three boys, ages 4, 6 and 8, has created a monthly participatory family service on Friday nights. As well, he has introduced the idea of a Friday night "pre-neg" instead of an "oneg.

"The idea is to come straight from work for services and a bite to eat, and then you go home for dinner after."

Recalling his childhood in Baton Rouge and New Orleans, which he considers home, Rabbi Streiffer said, "You really need your Jewish community [there,] because unlike in Thornhill, in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, you're the only Jewish kid in your class, if not your school.

"We learned the synagogue is the place to go to be yourself, to feel comfortable. And so I bring that sensibility to my rabbinate of wanting to create the synagogue as the place where every Jewish person can go and really be themselves, more than anywhere else."

At Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill, Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, 48, has also captured the attention of his congregants in the year since he began leading the shul.

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin

Leila Speisman – a former CJN reporter whose daughter Tammy died in February after struggling for many years with an eating disorder – said that the content and frank tone of Rabbi Korobkin's eulogy was not just unusual, but "unheard of." Eating disorders and mental illness are not subjects that Orthodox rabbis "run to talk about," she explained.

"I guess I come from a slightly different culture," said Rabbi Korobkin, who was raised in Los Angeles and served there before moving to Toronto. "I suppose that psychiatric care is very much in the forefront of the Southern California worldview." Part of that, he noted, is being able to address psychiatric needs in a more direct way.

Creating 'a real positive vibe'

"There's a certain European aspect to the culture here [in Toronto], where people aren't as willing to discuss problems or challenges as openly. My attitude is that if we want to be able to effect positive change, we have to identify what the problems are so we know how to address them."

If anything else points to the rabbi's West Coast upbringing, it's probably his "laid-back California approach" and "reputation for being easy-going" in his personal manner, according to shul president Harley Eklove.

He said that Rabbi Korobkin has created an "amazing atmosphere" at Friday night services, where an estimated 100 men now dance around the bimah after singing Lecha Dodi.

As well, Eklove added, the rabbi loves to sing, and has introduced clapping as part of the Shabbat service – an unusual innovation, given that there is a rabbinic (albeit not halachic) prohibition against it.

"There are two prevailing opinions among contemporary authorities," Rabbi Korobkin explained. He said the prohibition is mitigated by a number of halachic authorities, particularly in chassidic communities, "which emphasize servicing God with joy, which is to permit and even encourage clapping and singing during the prayer services on Shabbos."

Eklove said there is "a real positive vibe" at the shul.

Another change in the past year is that the rabbi has allowed women to serve on the board of the shul for the first time.

As well, Rabbi Korobkin has instituted weekly receptions so that he and his wife could meet all the congregants (more than 700 families).

"We're about halfway there," he said. "Hopefully, we'll get through the rest of the membership list over the next year." As a rabbi, he added, it's important to him to be approachable.

At Shaarei Tefillah Congregation – about 8 kilometres south of the BAYT – Rabbi Rafi Lipner took over as spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation this month. However, he has been a presence at the 600-member Orthodox shul for the past three years as associate rabbi.

Rabbi Rafi Lipner

The rabbi is probably better known in Toronto as founder of The House, a drop-in learning centre for young adults. He will continue to be affiliated with the centre, which is expected to develop a strong working relationship with the shul.

The 38-year-old father of seven, who has a BA in economics and a master of education degree, never planned to be a pulpit rabbi, but ended up being hired by Shaarei Tefillah to attract young families after he attended a minyan there and offered to help out.

A Toronto native who grew up at Congregation B'nai Torah, Rabbi Lipner started out in business school at Yeshiva University, but entered the rabbinical program after spending 24 hours in introspection based on his experiences in informal Jewish education.

"I had this internal struggle. I loved the learning, engaging, inspiring, interpersonal stuff," he said.

Among the changes he's introduced at the shul are a chesed program for children, and a break in the service that he instituted when he was leading auxiliary services at Rosh Hashanah.

Rabbi Lipner wanted worshippers to partake in kiddush so that they wouldn't be hungry during the last part of the service, he said, but he also encouraged them to go up to one or two people they didn't recognize and talk to them.

"People loved the idea there was a break in the service and an opportunity to meet people," said Mark Greenberg, Shaarei Tefillah's second vice-president and chair of its religious committee.

Greenberg described the rabbi as "a warm, engaging individual who's passionate about introducing people to Judaism. He's very non-judgmental and supportive.

"Even though he's an Orthodox rabbi, that's not what hits you in the face."

Rabbi Lipner told The CJN he believes in "community-inspired Judaism," which is related not just to his mid-service kiddush, but also to the open houses he and his wife have hosted on Shabbat at their home.

"The mantra we use at The House is that we hope you walk out the doors more than you were when you walked in. I think the shul's the same way," he said. "It's about nurturing the growth that everybody's on, in their own individual way."

Toronto duo take peek into high-fashion closets

Michelle Bitran
Intern

It's not every day that you get to peek into the closets of your style icons. Unless you happen to be Erin Kleinberg and Stephanie Mark: for them, it's all part of the job.

Toronto natives Kleinberg and Mark launched their style website The Coveteur (thecoveteur.com) in January 2011. Together with photographer Jake Rosenberg, they delve into the closets of the fashion elite, trendsetting designers, stylists and fashion magazine editors, and photo-document the treasures they find inside.

"We wanted to deconstruct street style and take it a step further than what was already out there by discovering the influences behind the trends and the stories behind the items people who we admire [wear]," said Kleinberg, 26, in an email interview.

She and Mark, 27, are childhood friends who met at summer camp. Each of them pursued careers in fashion before creating The Coveteur.

Kleinberg, a graduate of the University of Western

Ontario's Media Information and Technoculture program, created her own line of "semi-couture" tops in 2008 under her name. Before she put her designing on hold to work on The Coveteur, her clothes were selling at high-end retailers around the world, including Holt Renfrew and Barney's New York.

Mark, who studied fashion marketing at the renowned Parsons School in New York, was working as a stylist, helping to dress Hollywood fixtures like Charlize Theron and Julianne Moore.

Both chased internships and job opportunities relentlessly, with Kleinberg working as the assistant to Alex White, former fashion director of W Magazine.

"It's not about what you know, it's who you know," Mark said, stressing the importance of interning and working to make connections in the fashion industry.

After spending some time in New York, she and Kleinberg found themselves in Toronto. Catching up at a late-night get-together, the stylish duo watched The Social Network, which tells the story of Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg's rise to success.

The tale of entrepreneurial victory inspired them to take The Coveteur from dream to reality. "If you have a dream, eat, sleep and breathe it," said Kleinberg, explaining the importance of perseverance and hard work.

The Coveteur was designed to fill a "voyeuristic void" in the fashion world, giving style enthusiasts a peek into the closets of their dreams. The two were determined to add something new to the world of fashion blogging, which, however inspiring to most fashion junkies, was not quite cutting it for them.

Within a day of the site's launch, it was obvious that Mark and Kleinberg were not the only ones itching for a glimpse of the world's most fashion-forward closets.

McDonald's founder a hands-on philanthropist

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

George Cohon, 75, founder and senior chair of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada Ltd., founder of McDonald's in Russia and a former member of The CJN's board of directors calls himself a hands-on type of guy.

The Chicago native, who moved to Toronto in 1967 as the licensee of McDonald's Corporation for eastern Canada and served as president, chair and CEO of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada for 25 years remains involved in a number of community organizations, and tries to actively participate in all of them.

George Cohon

In June, Cohon, married with two sons and three grandchildren, received the key to Toronto from Mayor Rob Ford for his community work, which includes, among other things, founding Ronald McDonald House Charities in Canada and in Russia for sick children and their families receiving hospital treatment, co-chairing Toronto's Santa Claus Parade, and volunteering with the Ontario Science Centre, York University and Variety Village.

Cohon, who became a Canadian citizen in 1975, has received many distinctions for his charitable endeavours, including that of Officer of the Order of Canada, the Order of Ontario, Russia's Order of Friendship and the Israeli Prime Minister's Medal.

Getting involved, he said in an interview at McDonald's Canada head office, was a principle instilled in him at an early age. "I have always tried to support community organizations and get right in there and help out."

He has dinner at Ronald McDonald house, he says, and makes sure that he meets the parents and their kids.

"We opened a new house at the end of last year because we had been forced to turn away 70 per cent of the families [due to] lack of space. I found that unacceptable.

"I gave a speech at the opening, but I also went to meet the families. It was a [successful] $34 million campaign, but to me, getting to know the people staying there meant everything. Keeping families together when [one of them is sick] is very important."

When he visits, he said, he is often accompanied by his certified therapy dogs, mother and daughter Golden Retrievers, Tilly and Simmy.

"My wife Susan and I also take the dogs to Baycrest, often to the palliative care [unit.] We go from door to door and visit."

On one visit, Cohon, accompanied by Tilly, approached a closed door. "I knocked on the door and asked if we could come in. The woman responded that she wasn't dressed to see me but I could send in Tilly. After the visit, she told me that she wanted to keep Tilly as her roommate. When I told her my wife wouldn't let me in the house without the dog, she responded 'learn to live on the street.'

"That started a relationship between her and Tilly, and two weeks before the woman's death, her doctor told me the dog had brought her much happiness."

Cohon, who takes part in the Santa Claus Parade each year dressed as a clown and mingles with all the volunteers, says he is certainly a people person.

"I was at a McDonald's having coffee with my wife one day and saw a pregnant woman who looked like she was suffering from the heat. I gave her a card with a free coupon, and a few days later I received an e-mail from her telling me that McFlurries have gotten her through her pregnancy. Those are the e-mails I like to get."

Exploring the tastes of fashion's trendsetters

"Our success was pretty immediate—it suffices to say our site crashed. People really connected to what we were doing," Mark said.

In a year and a half, The Coveteur has found its way into well over 100 closets, documenting inspiring pieces with Rosenberg's sharp photographic eye. Style gurus who have opened their closet doors include accessories designer Rebecca Minkoff, Globe and Mail style reporter Amy Verner and Anna Dello Russo, editor at large and creative consultant for Vogue Japan.

Getting fashion celebrities to welcome The Coveteur into their homes and closets is becoming easier as the site gains popularity. "We're fortunate to have industry icons profiled on the site and they're eager to promote us, refer friends for the website and so on," Kleinberg said. Each fashion giant also brings a new fan base to The Coveteur, making it easier for Kleinberg and Mark to recruit new participants.

The Coveteur creators have offices in Toronto, but they fly often to New York and Los Angeles to get to some of the most coveted closets. Still, it was in Toronto where their own fashion obsessions began.

"My bubby Sidia Cowen was always dressed to the nines," Kleinberg said when asked about her first style inspiration. In fact, she once created a line of shirts made from her grandmother's chic vintage scarves.

For Mark, it was her mother who sparked her interest in all things fashion. Her "cool, laid back late 70s, early 80s style," taught Mark how to pick pieces that accentuate both her figure and her personality.

Although the six-inch stiletto heels and itty-bitty cocktail dresses in some of the website's pictures might leave you dubious about a fashionista's abilities to go about her daily tasks with ease, Mark and Kleinberg said their personal style is all about comfort.

"We're practical dressers. Being on set and going from shoot to show means comfy flats – we both love [French ballet shoe designer] Repetto – and transition dressing," Kleinberg said.

As the pair make their way from photo shoot to fashion show, they'll continue to expand The Coveteur. They're not ready just yet to divulge the details of what's to come, but they promise "big, big, big things!"

Bigger has usually proven to be better. "The bigger the risk, the bigger the payoff. We abandoned our careers to focus on The Coveteur and the rewards have been invaluable," Mark said.

Now that they've forged their own path into the fashion world, they can tell young fashion enthusiasts with certainty that hard work, intense dedication and constant networking and emailing really will pay off.

Kleinberg urges those chasing fashion careers to put their financial fears aside for a bit and to simply follow their dreams. "At the end of the day, do what you love and the rest – the money – will come."

Former CJN intern a CTV anchor

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Abigail Bimman loves telling stories.

As a teenager, Bimman spent a lot of time acting in community theatre, relishing the opportunity to relay a playwright's stories to an audience. At the time, she didn't know she wanted to be a journalist.

Now, from behind the news desk at CTV Kitchener, where she anchors the weekend news and works as a reporter and videographer during the week, the 26-year-old journalist can clearly see the connection between her love of theatre and her love of journalism: it's all in the stories.

"My passion is telling stories that matter to the community and matter to individuals," the Toronto native said. Working in local news lets her engage people in her community and tell their stories in depth.

After high school, Bimman decided to combine her love of storytelling and her strength in writing with a bachelor's degree in journalism at Carleton University in Ottawa.

There, she had her first introduction to broadcast reporting. "I was always very comfortable in front of a camera, or in front of an audience." In broadcast classes, she quickly felt at home as an on-camera reporter.

Bimman used the skills she learned at Carleton, both in broadcast and print journalism, to work as an intern in the news industry. In 2007, during her last summer as a student, she interned at The CJN, and was sent to Ukraine to see first-hand and to report on summer camps run by the Jewish Agency to help foster Jewish identity in the country's youth.

"I really learned a lot in that summer," said Bimman, who spent many summers at camp and understands the important role it can play in a child's life and development. Seeing the children learn about their heritage while having fun was "very special to watch."

Following graduation in 2008, Bimman went on to intern and work at TV news stations across Canada, including CTV News Channel in Toronto, the local CTV Ottawa station, CBC and Rogers TV for York Region. Before her current job at CTV Kitchener, Bimman helped to launch a nightly newscast for Durham Region with Studio 12 News at CHEX TV.

"What really helped my career was all of my internships," Bimman said, adding that, in many cases, internships led to jobs. She encourages students to intern as much as possible, and to speak to people in the industry to find out if the career is a good match for them.

Abigail Bimman

For Bimman, internships helped her meet industry professionals and were integral in finding her path within journalism. They helped her "not only to discover that this is what I wanted to do, but also to prove myself."

Young chef's menus focus on "eating the whole animal"

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Noah Goldberg, owner and executive chef of The Feasting Room, grew up eating Jewish foods and having Friday night dinners with his family.

Goldberg, 29, is an internationally trained chef who has recently returned to Toronto, where he was born and raised. The Feasting Room, located in the Orbit Room on College St., marks his professional culinary debut.

The Feasting Room is a "pop-up" restaurant, part of a contemporary trend in the food world where a concept restaurant opens for a relatively short time, in this case six months. And while it's not kosher, he said his Jewish background has definitely influenced his cooking. It may even be responsible for one of his latest dinner creations - roasted duck breast with blueberry blintzes and sweet potato latkes.

Goldberg's unique cuisine centres around his personal philosophy of using all parts of animals to craft a daily tasting menu, creating a gourmet experience for diners based on various, and at times, unexpected, cuts of meat.

Noah Goldberg

"I started cooking as a hobby in university," studying economics at Queen's University. Eventually, he said, "I... couldn't see myself doing anything else after graduating."

He decided to switch gears and pursue his passion for food as a career.

"Economics was very rigid. Cooking is very different. You can be more creative, expressive and original. I've developed a love for food and service and creating an environment for people," he said.

To further develop his knowledge and skills, Goldberg trained with top chefs in North America and the United Kingdom. After completing his degree in 2006, Goldberg worked with chef Susur Lee at Lee restaurant in Toronto. He then moved to New York in 2008 and worked at db Bistro Moderne for chef Daniel Boulud.

"This was your classic formal French restaurant run by a chef whose food I really look up to," he said. "It's as good as French food gets outside of France. I didn't have any formal kitchen training, so going there was a huge stepping stone."

After less than two years, Goldberg moved back to Toronto. Though he longed to work at Cyrus Restaurant in Sonoma, California, he couldn't get the proper visa. Instead, he worked as a butcher at Whitehouse Meats in St. Lawrence Market, which providentially led to his current passion.

"That job sparked my interest in butchery and using the whole animal. It was a different aspect of cooking that I hadn't been exposed to," he said.

Returning to the restaurant scene, Goldberg moved to London, England. He worked at Arbutus and Wild Honey, under chef Anthony Demetre. After six months, he was fortunate to get a job at St. John Bar & Restaurant.

News is not just about reporting

Bimman was hired at CTV Kitchener in February of last year. She began as a part-time videographer and reporter, meaning that she would go out to report on stories on her own, with just a tripod as her "cameraman."

"I can't count the number of times I've shown up at someone's house and they ask, 'where's the camera guy?'" But for Bimman, reporting, shooting and writing her own stories is thrilling.

"There are definitely challenges to being a one-person show, but there are huge rewards as well," like the freedom to work on all aspects of producing a captivating story.

About two months after she began her work at CTV Kitchener, Bimman was asked to become the weekend news anchor, while continuing her reporting duties during the week.

"It was a great, pleasant surprise," she said, and though she enjoys the storytelling aspect of reporting, anchoring has become another one of her passions. "I've come to really embrace it and enjoy it," she said.

Being an anchor means that Bimman has had to put her theatre and improvisation skills to use.

Reading the news live can be stressful, especially when technology does not co-operate, but Bimman said she and her small team are able to get through the occasional technological blunder. The key is to "keep calm and try to get through it in the best way that you can," she said.

Though her news career is still in its early stages, Bimman has been a part of some very important stories. Some of the most memorable have been reporting on the Goderich tornado and on the problems at telecommunication company Research in Motion.

But Bimman also loves telling the small stories in her community, and giving a voice to people "who may not have an opportunity otherwise to have their stories told," and she gets more chances to do just that when reporting on local, rather than national, news.

For Bimman, the news will never be just about her reporting. It's about the people she interviews and the stories they have to share. Despite her talent and flair for interviewing, she insists that "it's really about the person on the other side of the camera."

A new menu every week

"St. John moulded me into the person and chef that I am today. It was the best experience of my life. Fergus Henderson, the chef, is incredible. The food they do there, it's just the right way to cook. They use entire animals, putting non-mainstream things on their menu."

A year and a half later, Goldberg returned to Toronto, driven to create something similar here.

"At St. John, during the holidays, we did feasting menus which were all based on one animal and I totally fell in love with it," he said. "Once the ball started rolling, everything led to this concept. I wanted my restaurant in Toronto to be different and to offer people something they've never had before."

The Feasting Room, which opened on May 24, encourages diners "to eat the whole beast," Goldberg said. "Every week we create a new six course blind tasting menu focusing on one animal."

He carefully butchers the animals "to get the most out of them with as little as possible going to waste. Not only does this reinforce the idea of conscientious eating, but it is a good example of sustainable eating practices."

Each week's menu depends on the animal on the block, so Goldberg and his sous chef must be constantly inventive. "We talk about what we want to do on Monday and Tuesday. Wednesday is butchery day. Thursday we cook."

The animal of the week is posted on the restaurant's website, but the menu is kept secret until the meal is served. When diners are seated, they're given a card wrapped in butcher's paper with a diagram of the animal they'll be eating that night.

The animal is marked with numbers that show the part of its body that will be used for each course. Diners don't know what dishes they'll be eating until the food is presented to them.

"I'm thrilled with the food we're putting out," said Goldberg.

The Feasting Room has already received rave reviews by food critics, and Goldberg is pleased that his concept has been well received.

"The response has been great. Our diners seem to love the idea of eating the whole animal. It's a bit of an aggressive concept, but the meal and experience are amazing."

Family and friends have been "super supportive" of Goldberg's achievements, he said. "Part of the reason I wanted to come back to Toronto is because there's nothing better than cooking for friends and family."

The Feasting Room is a temporary venture, but Goldberg hopes to eventually open his own restaurant in the city. He's not yet sure of the details or location, he'd love a space that "relates," offering diners a venue as unique as his food.

For more information on The Feasting Room, visit www.thefeastingroom.com. The restaurant is open from Thursday to Sunday, 6pm to 10pm, and on Monday from 6pm until "late."

Baseball is Mike Wilner's passion

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

There's something about baseball that attracts Jewish kids to the game – as players, fans and quite often as broadcasters.

That includes Mike Wilner, the radio host of Blue Jays games on Sportsnet 590 The Fan and a graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Anne and Max Tannebaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

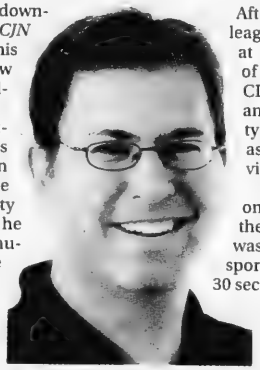
Wilner, 42, said that as a kid, he used to listen with rapt attention to legendary Jays radio broadcasters Tom Cheek and Jerry Howarth, the latter of whom he now works with.

"When I look back, I remember my father and grandfather watching sports and baseball, which is pretty common. But for some reason, baseball and Jews seem to go together. I don't know why," Wilner said.

The world of baseball broadcasting has produced many Jewish personalities, including the legendary Al Michaels and the great Mel Allen. And aside from Wilner, Toronto has also produced the likes of Elliotte Friedman, who once hosted Jays telecasts on CBC; ESPN radio baseball announcer Dan Shulman, another Bialik grad who also once worked at the Fan, and Sportsnet's own Shi Davidi, among others.

"Most nights, you could probably put a minyan together in the press box," quipped Wilner.

In a recent interview at a downtown café, he spoke to The CJN about how he developed his love for the game and how he landed what he considers to be his dream job.



Mike Wilner

He was always interested in baseball, but it was while he was enrolled in the bachelor of commerce program at the University of Toronto in 1988 that he ended up covering intramural sports for CIUT, the school's radio station.

It was around that time that he thought, "Why not go for a career in baseball?" he said.

He made it his mission to cover minor league baseball in order to gain experience as a broadcaster, and in 1989, he got a job calling games on the radio for the Class-A Welland Pirates.

He then used his dual U.S.-Canadian citizenship (through his mother) to move on to do play-by-play for other teams, including the Class-A Watertown Indians in New York state, and the Double-A Hardware City Rock Cats in Connecticut.

After working the minor league circuit, he interned at the Fan in the summer of 1993, then returned to CIUT as a sports radio host and would call in university sports scores to the Fan as well as various wire services.

The way Wilner tells it, one day in 1994, he called the Fan with his scores and was asked by the station's sports director to "give them 30 seconds" of recaps.

It turns out, the Fan's sports director at the time was the same guy who had hired Wilner at CIUT.

"So I gave them 30 seconds. Then the next week did it again and when I called 680 News [with varsity scores], I asked them if they wanted 30 seconds. And the woman who answered – I still don't know who she was to this day – said 'sure.' That was on a Sunday, and on the Tuesday after, I got a phone call to come audition for a job at 680 News," he said.

´My work is what normal people do for fun´

The audition went well, but there was no job available at the time.

Wilner continued to pay his broadcasting dues for the next year by working various radio jobs before 680 News came calling yet again, this time with a bona fide job offer to be the weekend and evening "sports guy", covering all sports but also many Blue Jays games and milestone Toronto sports events.

That job lasted for seven amazing years, Wilner said.

"I got to cover the last game at the [Maple Leaf] Gardens, the first game at the Air Canada Centre, the first Toronto Raptors' game… if there was a big story for Toronto sports between 1995 and 2001, I covered it," he said.

After building his credentials and making a name for himself at 680 News, other suitors came calling.

In March 2001, Wilner received a "very nice offer" from a sports news syndication service seeking to woo him away from 680 News, but simultaneously, longtime Fan 590 Blue Jays pre- and post-game announcer Scott Ferguson decided to leave his job.

"That April, Fan 590 sports director Scott Metcalf called me. He'd remembered me from my summer internship and that I was really into baseball and asked me if I wanted the job. And I said yes," he said.

Wilner spent one year reporting for the Fan 590 about baseball and other sports, and in March 2002, after Roger's Communications bought the Jays and the Fan 590, he was handed the pre- and post-game announcing position.

The rest is history.

Wilner has spent the last decade working exclusively with the Jays.

It's been a dream come true, he said.

"It really flies by. I don't remember a lot of the early days of the show, but working with Tom Cheek was amazing.

"My work is what normal people do for fun. My office is the ballpark. Even after 10 years, it's still fun. While I'm not overwhelmed by it anymore, I'm also not jaded. I remember the first time I walked out onto the field at [what was then called Skydome]. It was the first day it opened. That was incredible. It's all still really exciting," he said.

Wilner, who also hosts the popular Jays' post-game show Jaystalk, doesn't suffer callers who can't back up their statements or make coherent arguments about the team.

"I call things as I see them, with no agenda one way or the other. People get angry, but it's usually people on both sides of whatever issue I'm discussing, so I figure I'm doing something right," he said.

Some consider his style polarizing, but he likes to analyze the team and the sport with as much balance as possible.

"I try to impress on casual fans who may be more reactive to news about the Jays and less knowledgeable than hardcore fans that in baseball, if you lose every other game, you'll be fine. If you win five out of every nine games… that's 90 wins and that's a great year," he said.

Jewish texts and history bring artist's vision to life

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Laya Crust has been drawing since she was a little girl, but it wasn't until she was in university that she began to realize that her passion for art could be more than just a hobby.

"I always, always drew – all the time," Crust said. "Even when I was in elementary school, I used to make little notebooks and hide them under my desk."

The Winnipeg native studied French literature and design at the University of Manitoba before making the move to Toronto to pursue her passions. She ended up staying in the city, where she now lives with her husband and their six children, who range in age from 16 to 28.

"I thought I'd come to Toronto to study art and Judaism at the same time," she said. Crust came from a traditional Jewish home, and had always taken an interest in her heritage.

She studied at the Three Schools of Art, since closed, as well as at the Ontario College of Art (now OCAD University). She took classes in printmaking, papermaking and book binding, but focused mainly on lithography, a printing process that traditionally uses a stone or metal plate to press ink onto paper. Crust also took classes about Judaism, and participated in Hillel activities, including a Hebrew calligraphy course that would later help launch her career.

"It was another expression of Jewish art," Crust said of the calligraphy class. Shortly after she completed it, she got a phone call from a person who wanted her to make a ketubah for their wedding.

"It was sort of out of the blue," she said, but she was eager to use her skills to design a ketubah. These Jewish marriage contracts are often elaborately decorated, and Crust saw it as an opportunity to research and try out new aspects of Jewish art.

Research is a major part of each ketubah

With that project, Crust found her niche. Now, she has designed more than 600 original ketubot, featuring different styles of art and depicting everything from elaborate land- and cityscapes to a pair of embracing doves. Her studies in Judaism and art with experts both in North America and in Jerusalem, shine through in her detailed work.

Laya Crust mixes Persian-Jewish imagery with quotations and historical religious symbols in her art.

Though she initially studied printmaking, Crust enjoys working in various media, including fabric and stained glass.

"If an artist stays in the same style forever, they don't grow as an artist and the work loses its edge of excitement," she said. Any time she has an opportunity to try a new type of art, she embraces it.

Crust's Torah mantles, parochets (coverings for the Aron Kodesh) and huge mosaics can be seen in Jewish institutions and private homes in North America and Israel.

One collaboration, with glass artist Sarah Hall, is a stained-glass window themed with the biblical story of the binding of Isaac, installed at the Union for Reform Judaism in New York City.

Before she started creating Jewish art, Crust says, "I'd always loved all of the stories in the Tanach and tfillah, but I read them more as beautiful history and literature, rather than expressing them visually." Now, those texts often inspire her designs.

For Crust, research is a major part of each ketubah or Jewish work of art that she creates. She spends days researching the history of the imagery involved, and in the case of ketubot and personal gifts or commissions, she makes a special effort to learn which themes and images are important to the clients.

Artist Laya Crust

In 2011, Rabbi Shalom Schachter and his wife Marcia Gilbert commissioned an illuminated Megillat Esther, the scroll read each year on Purim. Crust learned the art of sofrut, Jewish scribal technique, in order to complete the project.

According to Jewish law, women can write megillot and ketubot, but not other sacred texts, like a Torah. For Crust, who is observant, the opportunity to learn sofrut was an honour.

"I felt I was becoming a member of an ancient club," she said, referring to the scribal tradition that has been passed down for thousands of years. "Getting to that amount of focus for a long period of time…it was like going into a meditative state with the letters."

The bright, detailed art that accompanies her megillah's text is based both on extensive research of art in Persia, where the story of Purim is set, and on the interests and family history of Rabbi Schachter and his wife. The scroll was displayed in the John M. Kelly Library at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto.

Crust is currently working on creating a set of images for each Haftorah portion as a project for Beth David Synagogue in Toronto.

She studies the texts and their history to find the details that will make the art come alive for viewers. "I want to give them a connection to history, to possibility and to Judaism through the image."

For Crust, sharing the inspiring qualities of Judaism with viewers is central. Through art, she explores her unique understanding of Jewish life. "Nature and creation and beauty are all connected, and the fulcrum, or the centre of the wheel for that, for us, is our Judaism."

Ghana experience transforms Toronto rebbetzin

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Joan Dolgin and her family have been at the heart of Temple Sinai congregation since her husband, Rabbi Michael Dolgin, took a position there 20 years ago, when they moved from the United States to Toronto.

As a rebbetzin and a special education professional, Dolgin has run the shul's children's choir, participated in sisterhood organizations, tutored children at the congregation's school and prepared children with disabilities for bar and bat mitzvahs.

Seeing her pupils stand confidently in front of the congregation "was extraordinarily fulfilling and beautiful." For Dolgin, who has always connected with children, it is amazing to see students with disabilities and their families learn how capable they truly are.

"I have always taken my role very, very seriously," Dolgin said of her work in the congregation. Working nonstop at the shul is a labour of love, but about a year and a half ago, she decided she needed a temporary change of scenery.

"I wanted to go somewhere where I could sort of rekindle and re-discover the value of what I was doing." For Dolgin, that place was Ghana. From January to March of 2011, she joined a volunteer program at a school for children with special needs.

"I immediately fell in love with the people," she said of her first experience in Ghana. Dolgin spent two months volunteering at the Gbi Kledzo Special School in the village of Kledzo.

She helped the students, who ranged in age from six to 30, get ready each morning, and organized activities for them throughout the day. Dolgin was most impressed with the way in which the children at the school were able to play freely and joyfully, without being instructed or taught to play particular games.

"In general, the minute you try to teach play, it's no longer play," she said. The typical North American approach towards caring for children with disabilities can sometimes be too structured when it comes to playtime.

Dolgin with 12-year-old Prince. The children she met in Ghana hold a special place in her heart.

"They play in Ghana – it's just breathtakingly beautiful," she said. Dolgin quickly felt a special connection, cherishing the time she had with the students. "I've always had a deep, deep love of children – and the children at this school, I can't talk about them without crying," even after only two months.

Life-changing volunteer work in Africa

Dolgin came back to Toronto enamoured with the people, the culture and the experiences she'd had in Ghana. It wasn't a question of whether she would return, but when.

"I came back and my husband was like, 'tell me stories.'" But though she'd kept a blog documenting her travels, she found herself at a loss to explain the true impact that volunteering had made on her. "It's just so hard to put into words."

Dolgin decided she would take her husband to see what her world in Ghana was all about. The couple took a trip there this past winter.

The organization she had volunteered with on her first trip stopped running the program at the Gbi Special School, so Dolgin decided to create her own organization to bring volunteers to Ghana.

She named the organization The Sky is My Limit, and last fall, when it was still very much in its beginning stages, she met with Ryerson University's Alternative Spring Break (ASB) co-ordinators to talk about a possible collaboration.

ASB Ryerson is a student-run group that organizes travel volunteer experiences in developing countries for university students. The group was looking for a program and destination for the spring of 2012, and Dolgin's organization was a perfect fit.

Because The Sky is My Limit was just starting out, planning for a spring trip to Ghana meant Dolgin had to design the ideal volunteering trip right away. The collaboration with ASB "pushed the agenda into lightning speed."

Dolgin holding 10-year-old Akos, one of the children she met through her volunteering.

This May, 18 ASB Ryerson participants joined Dolgin on a month-long volunteer trip to Kledzo. The youngest of the Dolgins' three sons, 15-year-old Zachary, joined the group as well.

Their goal was to build a residence for the young adult students with disabilities that she had met earlier in Ghana. Living on their own would allow them to develop more independence, and work on their vocational skills, like traditional Ghanaian kente weaving and batik fabric dyeing.

"In Ghana, having a disability is really devaluing," Dolgin explained, adding that the opportunity for young adults with disabilities to learn these skills will give them a chance to contribute to their communities.

By the time the ASB students left, after four weeks of construction and spending time with children from the Gbi Special School, the residence was nearly complete. It was named Selma's Place, in memory of Dolgin's longtime friend and Jewish educator, Selma Sage.

The trip "was extremely transformative, not just for me, but for the Ryerson students and for the community of Kledzo," Dolgin said. The community "opened their hearts, their homes and their arms for us."

She's already planning to return to Ghana, and hopes to one day build a community centre for the people she has come to know and love there. What began as a single volunteer trip taken to reinvigorate herself became a life-changing connection that she hopes will continue for many years to come.

Clothing entrepreneur values community, education

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

At first glance, Moshe Modiera, the brand director and managing partner for Rebus Productions, a clothing company, may not seem like someone with the typical "Jewish look."

But with his father a kess, the equivalent of a rabbi within the Ethiopian Jewish community, plus his own years of experience working for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and promoting Jewish and Israeli causes, Modiera is a good reminder of the true diversity of Toronto's Jewish community.

Born in Toronto, the 30-year-old Modiera lived in Israel, Italy, Sweden and the United States before settling here permanently in 1991.

He grew up religious. "My father is a kess, my father's father was a kess." Adds Modiera with a laugh, "I think that might end with me – I'm a lowly shmatte peddler."

He calls settling into the Canadian Jewish community at the age of eight "emotional."

"When I lived in Israel, we were in Ramat Gan and there were a lot of Ethiopians, Moroccans and people of different minorities... It was only when we got here that people would ask, 'How are you Jewish?'... That was a bit of a shock for me," Modiera recalled.

Moshe Modiera

"As time went on, people became more interested but initially, they didn't get it. I remember writing this essay in [high school]... about our identity and heritage and I wrote an essay that was tongue-in-cheek called 'Too Black to be Jewish, Too Jewish to be Black.' We were in this weird island in the middle."

But overall, his experience with the Toronto Jewish community was nothing but positive. His family was welcomed with open arms by Ohr Somayach in Thornhill, which helped them settle in.

"One of the things that made living in different cities easy for me is that my father always impressed on us not only to learn about Judaism, but to learn about the cultures around us... To adapt to the minhagim of whatever community you're in."

Modiera said he also learned about people's natural tendency to assign labels to others.

A portion of profit goes to charity

"People want to put you in neat little boxes that they can deal with – like 'you're an Ethiopian Jew,' but my mother's Moroccan, and also has Dutch heritage. My father is Ethiopian, but he also has Portuguese heritage. I'm an African-Jewish mutt."

Despite people's confusion about how to peg Modiera, he said he never experienced discrimination from the Jewish community and was more than willing to give back as an adult.

"For most of my 20s, I did a lot of Israel advocacy. I did a lot of work with Hillel, I worked with UJA for just under a year promoting Israel, showing Israel as a diverse melting pot and a country rich with technology and finance leaders."

Working with UJA strengthened his belief in volunteerism. "You start to realize that it is the bedrock of the Jewish community... I was volunteering on these committees with people between 20 and 40 years old, no matter where they fell along the religious spectrum... but there was a sense that [Jews feel] they need to give back to the community."

Modiera's devotion to social activism extended beyond Jewish causes. Before delving into the fashion industry with a short stint with Hugo Boss, he worked on the Toronto Live Green program, an environmental marketing project for the City of Toronto, "trying to get Torontonians to think about their purchasing decisions that supported a more environmental concept and being conscious of your carbon footprint," he explained.

Despite his success and experience in the working world, Modiera, raised by parents who impressed upon him the importance of education and who has already earned two degrees from McMaster University, still has ambitions to further his academic career.

> 'People want to put you in neat little boxes'

"Education and school was very important to my family. My mother speaks 12 languages – she's a linguistics major... My father is also very schooled," he said.

"Law school is something my parents really wanted for me. I wrote the LSATs twice and got into a school in Australia and in England, but I got involved in business because I'm a creative guy."

He said he plans to obtain an MBA that he hopes will hone his business skills.

For now, Modiera is getting hands-on experience in the business world as Adam Bledin's partner and brand director for Rebus Productions.

Although Bledin and Modiera have known each other since high school, it was a chance meeting in 2010 that led to their current partnership.

"I ran into him and he told me about Rebus and told me what he was trying to do... He showed me some designs and told me about his contacts in Turkey... I thought, 'that's really hard to get.'"

They decided to combine their expertise and contacts and have been running the company together since 2011.

They started with denim, making jeans from high-quality Turkish cotton, "But denim is a tough market and it's very competitive," he said, adding that his vision is to brand Rebus denim as Toronto's label.

"As time wore on, wanting to pay homage to our high school days and going to camp, we thought, 'let's come up with some sweatpants,' and we came up with Lazypants. We trademarked it. We own the word."

People have really been responding to them. Even GQ Magazine caught on, calling Lazypants the "best of what's to come in 2012."

"It's been meteoric. People love the branding, and love what we're about. We're about Toronto lifestyle and really trying to share the diversity of Toronto life with the world."

"When I look at Ralph Lauren or Calvin Klein, how they were able to export a certain kind of Americana to the world, it was something that I really wanted to do with Rebus – export the Canadian, cottage, easy-going, east coast lifestyle."

True to his charitable origins, Modiera said a portion of Rebus' profits goes towards charitable causes such as Peace Builders International, an organization that works with at-risk youth to keep them out of the criminal justice system.

Rebus products are available at Toronto clothing stores such as TNT and Dew, as well as online at www.rebuslife.com.

Wilner working his ´dream job´

Wilner thinks the general obsession with hockey in Canada can sometimes muddle the casual fan's viewpoint on baseball.

"Hockey's season is half as long as baseball's. So living and dying with every game and every loss [of the Blue Jays] is really counterproductive to your health as a baseball fan. Even the best team is going to lose 60 games a year. That's maybe hard for a hockey fan to understand."

Asked if being Jewish helps inform his perception of baseball or his analysis, Wilner said he believes it does.

"It's so firmly ingrained, it informs everything you do. But aside from a little sprinkling of Yiddish on the broadcast once in a while or 'mazal tovs' to [players] on Twitter when they hit big home runs, that's a tough question to answer," he said. "Everything comes out of being Jewish. Not that it makes me watch baseball differently, or talk about it differently.

"One of the pillars of Judaism, aside from the routines and observances, is the intellectual side – the thinking more deeply about issues, not accepting things at face value, and the questioning that comes from being Jewish... that probably has something to do with [my style]."

Wilner said while he hasn't done too much volunteering within the Jewish community specifically, he would "love to do more, if anybody's interested."

It should be noted that he has spoken to students at TannenbaumCHAT for its career day, and this past June he helped coach Bialik's baseball team to the Toronto Jewish Day School League co-ed softball championship.

He said when he speaks to young people interested in pursuing a career in broadcasting, he advises them "not to do it the way I did."

Instead, he said, they should go to school and then work hard as an intern.

"And never say 'no' to any work [in the field]," Wilner said.

"It's funny, the first time I was on the radio was in 1988. The first time I earned a cent for being on the radio was in 1995. Today, people intern for three months, and if they're not hired somewhere, they get all huffy," he said.

"The first 13 years of my broadcast career I spent doing anything and everything anybody asked me to do. So my advice is to do whatever you can... and once you get in, if you're good, you'll get wherever you need to go."

While he realizes he's working in a dream job, there is a cost: lack of family time.

Wilner is on call literally 24-7. If Blue Jays' news breaks, he needs to be on top of it and ready for an interview or to provide analysis. Plus, the rigours of a 162-game schedule offer little chance to spend quality time with his wife and two daughters during the baseball season.

"I try to spend as much time with them as I can in between games. But when they're in school and the Jays are playing at home, I almost never see [the family]," he said. "And in the winter, I try to just get away with them."

Ironically, it was a family member who inspired him to pursue a career in broadcasting.

Wilner's grandfather, Percy Wilner, who passed away at age 92 in 2007, was a prime influence in his life.

"He always had a radio near him, always listened to ball games. So me going on the broadcast and knowing he was always there, listening, that was phenomenal."

Jewish-Muslim dialogue debunks stereotypes

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A new Toronto-based Jewish-Muslim dialogue is garnering worldwide interest from those who'd like to replicate the program in other cities.

Dialogue co-chairs David Nitkin, founder of EthicScan Canada, an ethics consulting company, and Tariq Khan, a journalist with the Canadian newspaper Weekly Press Pakistan, joined forces earlier this year to launch a program to help Jews and Muslims learn about each other and debunk baseless stereotypes.

"It's a chance to break down barriers. We stress that we are all children of the same God, we stress that we have a lot of things in common," Nitkin said.

"It's non-political, it's non-religious, but it includes people who are religious and secular on both sides and it is an attempt to dispel ignorance of the other and to learn how much we have in common."

David Nitkin

Most participants are not religious, said Nitkin. "To be honest, some of them are anti-religion and some of them don't ever enter a mosque. We don't invite imams and rabbis… The idea is to just talk… about our values… what makes for a good person."

The invitation-only group has grown from six people at the March meeting in Khan's home to 22 people at a second session in Nitkin's home and finally, in June, to 40 people hosted in a Toronto library. The next session is scheduled for late September.

Through his work with the Weekly Press Pakistan, Khan, a 30-year journalism veteran who moved to Canada 10 years ago, writes articles in Urdu about the dialogue and sends them to 14,000 Indian and Pakistani journalists who are members of the news outlet's online forum.

As a result, news about the dialogue has gone global, reaching Turkey, France, Israel, the West Bank, the United Arab Emirates, India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Malaysia, and the United States.

Nitkin said, "I've had calls from Vancouver, I've had calls from Detroit, Calgary, Miami asking, 'What is this bizarre thing you're doing, and can we replicate it?'"

"This is not rocket science. It's just opening your heart and your home to somebody that you might otherwise not meet and not have an opportunity to interact with."

The first time Nitkin and his wife met Khan, they quickly realized they "knew nothing about Muslims, we knew nothing about the difference between Arbi and Ajmi Muslims and [Khan's] kids knew nothing about Israel and more shocking… they knew nothing about the Shoah. And they were absolutely fascinated about the Shoah."

It was this encounter and realization of how little they knew of their respective cultures and backgrounds that motivated them to organize the dialogue.

Participants at the third meeting, in June, were split into four smaller working groups to get to know one another and dispel myths about each group.

Nitkin and the other Jewish participants learned about the difference between Arbi and Ajmi Muslims.

"Arbi, or Arab, Muslims – there are upwards of 375 million of them – live in places like Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Iran." This group is further split into two groups, Sunni and Shi'ite.

"They're politicized, have certain views about Israel and they know about Palestine and believe themselves to be the [entire] Muslim world."

But there are also about 650 million Ajmi Muslims, living in countries like India, Pakistan and Afghanistan, who are "looked down upon by the Arbi Muslims because they are not Arab-speaking, and they don't have attitudes toward Israel. If anything, the ones I've met are quite sympathetic to Israel… This was a revolution to me."

Muslim participants learned more about the Holocaust, while Jewish group members were made aware of the violent 1947 partition of India into the Hindu nation of India and the Muslim nation of Pakistan, which displaced up to 12.5 million people and resulted in the deaths of up to two million others. The meetings have also addressed stereotypes harboured by each group, which Nitkin said are born not out of hatred, but ignorance.

"One of the things I remember from the first meeting in Tariq's home was that in the 25 years he lived in Pakistan, he'd never seen an article produced about Israel from the Israeli government," he said.

"There was an enormous gap and lack of knowledge in Pakistan about Israel."

Nitkin feels encouraged by the scores of people who are eager to "replace stereotypes with a little bit of knowledge.

"We Jews know something about being alone in the world and not having friends, and there are literally hundreds of millions of people who we think of as being hostile to us or to Israel who literally know nothing about it."

For more information about the dialogue contact Khan at 905-565-8179 or Nitkin at 416-783-7569.

Deputy consul general keeps low profile, but does key work

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israeli consul generals usually get the bulk of media coverage and requests for interviews, while their deputies often go unheralded.

In Toronto, that person is Hadas Wittenberg Silberstein.

Since her arrival in late 2010, the unassuming deputy consul general for Toronto and Western Canada has quietly gone about organizing numerous events and galas on behalf of Israel, mostly to do with bringing cultural exhibits and artists to Canada.

But Wittenberg Silberstein's role is also to be the glue that holds the diplomatic functions of the consulate together.

Assisting the consul general – first under recently departed Amir Gissin, and now for D. J. Schneeweiss – she provides crucial support for her busy bosses.

It's a role she relishes, she said.

Speaking to The CJN in a recent interview at a Bathurst Manor café, Wittenberg Silberstein, 37, spoke about her role and why she joined Israel's foreign ministry more than 10 years ago.

"The deputy consul general is No. 2 in the hierarchy of the consulate. And I do whatever the consul general asks of me," she said. "But it's interesting, because I've been the No. 2 in my [other postings], and you end up defining what that job is at the various consulates" depending on what's needed in any given city or community, she said.

Hadas Wittenberg Silberstein

In the case of the consulate in Toronto, she said, she didn't replace anyone. The position was created by Gissin, who had embarked on an ambitious plan to use Toronto as the epicentre of Israel's rebranding strategy, and her job was to take pressure off the consul general.

"The foreign ministry realized that [the consul general's duties] in Toronto were too big for just one diplomat," she said.

Wittenberg Silberstein likened her position to that of "interior minister" for the consulate, with the consul general's role being that of a "foreign minister."

"For every project the [consul general] initiates with local partners in Toronto and Canada, I have to [contact Israel's] foreign ministry to get the budget and find Israeli partners for it."

As someone who loves the arts, Wittenberg Silberstein has also cultivated ongoing Israeli cultural programming in Canada.

She has built relations with art galleries, festivals and artists across Canada to further Israel's ability to export its culture to North America.

"This is one area where I've taken a central role," she said, noting that over the last two years she's helped create more links between Israeli cinema and the Toronto International Film Festival, as well as with Toronto's Luminato festival.

"Canadian and Israeli cultures bring different elements to the [artistic] table, and I think they're a good mix."

As a result of her efforts, Israeli directors are increasingly choosing Canada as a film-shooting destination, and Canadian directors are doing the same when it comes to Israel, she said.

Prior to becoming deputy consul general in Toronto, Wittenberg Silberstein held the same role at Israeli consulates in Belgrade, Serbia, (from 2004 to 2007) and in San Jose, Costa Rica (2008 to 2010).

She holds a master's degree in social work from Hebrew University and was a medic in the Israel Defence Forces.

Neil Armstrong praised in Israel

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel officially bade farewell to Neil Armstrong Sunday, a day after the 82-year-old space pioneer died.

Speaking at Sunday's cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised the first man to walk on the moon, who "symbolized the spirit of human curiosity, humanity's will to break through barriers, to understand the secrets of the universe, to understand the infinity of space and time, and the significance of our universe in that infinity.

"I do not think that many people have had the privilege of taking such a far-reaching step," Netanyahu said of Armstrong, who visited Israel in 2007. "There are those who reached new continents and crossed new oceans, but this was the first time that a human being set foot on another world. This was a breakthrough that will forever stand in the annals of human history."

NASA, the agency Armstrong worked for, has been making history for decades, and in recent years, Israel has been part of that history, the latest example being the Israeli-developed hardware and software that accompanied NASA's Curiosity probe to Mars. To develop the Curiosity and ensure that it could withstand the harsh elements of the Martian atmosphere, NASA used product life-cycle management (PLM) software developed by Siemens in Israel.

Also developed in Israel for Curiosity was a cryogenic cooler, made by a company on Kibbutz Ein Harod, to preserve materials gathered from the Martian surface for analysis.

Israel's co-operation with NASA goes back to at least 1985, Israel Space Agency officials said, and NASA has signed several co-operation agreements with Israel, the first in 1996.

Hat Firm Honoured

CALGARY — The Jewish-owned hat company that pioneered Calgary's iconic white cowboy hat was honoured earlier this summer by the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta. It unveiled a plaque July 30 at Hotel Arts, on the former site of Smithbilt Hat Co., as part of Historic Calgary Week, the Calgary Herald reported. The plaque was unveiled by Tema and Clara Blackstone, the granddaughter and daughter of Russian Jewish immigrant Morris Shumiatcher. He founded Smithbilt in 1919 after buying the former Calgary Hat Works factory with a $300 loan and changing its name. Its white hats have become a symbol of the city and have been given to visiting dignitaries since the 1950s.

Labelling Regulation

PRETORIA — South Africa has adopted a regulation against labelling of goods from the West Bank as being produced in Israel. The government said Aug. 22 that goods made in the West Bank should now say they originated in the "Israeli Occupied Territories." It said the move aims to prevent consumers thinking such goods come from Israel. Jewish leaders, including the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, the Zionist Federation and South Africa's chief rabbi, deplored the decision as biased against Israel, saying the "measures are discriminatory, divisive, inconsistent with South African trade policy and seriously flawed from both an administrative and procedural point of view."

Hate Letter Received

LYON — The chief rabbi of Lyon, Richard Wertenschlag, received a letter threatening to "punish a Jew for every complaint the Jews make on TV." The threat came in a two-page letter delivered Aug. 10. It contained two photos of a concentration camp. Rabbi Wertenschlag reported the letter to police on Aug. 12. The authors of the handwritten text signed it "the righteous network." They added, "Every time you go on television to complain, a Jew – man, woman, child or family – will be punished." The rabbi said he received another hate letter in April, which was both "antisemitic and anti-Arab," but decided not to go to police. Last month, police arrested two youths in Lyon for allegedly attacking a 17-year-old Jewish boy. The boy is a student at Ozar Hatorah, a Jewish school in Toulouse where, on March 19, a Muslim extremist murdered three children and a rabbi.

Cdn. Jewish WWII Airmen To Be Honoured

LEEDS, England — Seven Jewish Canadian airmen will be remembered at Stonefall Airmen's Cemetery in Harrogate, England, on Sept. 9 when the Association of Jewish Ex-Service Men and Women (AJEX) takes part in a Royal Air Force ceremony to honour those who died in World War II.

Harry Ratner

At a ceremony in the presence of the mayors of Harrogate and Knaresborough, senior military officers will lay wreaths flanked by many standards, a squadron of air cadets and a military band.

There will be an RAF fly-past to honour those who died. AJEX will lay a wreath and the standard of the Leeds Major Clive Behrens branch of the Royal British Legion will be present.

The annual event is supported by AJEX as the seven Jewish airmen have no known relatives to visit. Afterward, AJAX members visit each grave to say Kaddish, dip the two Jewish Standards in their honour and place a Shield of David poppy by each memorial stone.

The seven airmen are RCAF air gunner Jack Tass of Prince Albert, Sask., RCAF air gunner Harry Ratner of Winnipeg, RCAF pilot Ernest Israel Glass, RCAF air bomber Robert Sirluck of Winnipeg, RCAF flying officer Morley Bernard Stock of Regina, RCAF flight engineer R.P. Marks and RCAF air gunner Joseph Zareikin.

Toronto congregations connect with First Nations at powwow

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A recent invitation to a powwow on a reserve north of Parry Sound provided a timely opportunity for representatives of six Toronto synagogues, as well as the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), to connect with a First Nations community.

This year, both the CCRJ and the Bayview Corridor of Synagogues (BCS) – an interdenominational group of six congregations that collaborate for social action events – will focus on issues faced by First Nations communities.

Helen Poizner, past chair of social action at Temple Emanu-El, told The CJN that the BCS came up with the idea last winter after reading news about housing issues facing First Nations communities in northern Ontario.

Kim Wheatley – a traditional hand drummer and singer originally from the Shawanaga First Nation Reserve, an Anishinabe Ojibway community – performed at an awareness-raising event in February at Temple Emanu-El, and became the BCS' resource person. At a subsequent event, she shared her perspective on water issues.

"My community spends over a million dollars a year purchasing water, and we're 20 minutes north of Parry Sound," she said in an interview. "We have water trucks that come to fill our reservoir, and we have to take an enormous amount of our budget to ensure we have water to drink, to bathe in, to cook. To me, that's the most massive issue. We're not far from the infrastructure of a big town.

"As a result of that [event], the concept of partnering came about," said Wheatley, who is also interested in establishing a library on the reserve.

So that our people thrives

The Jewish People Policy Institute (JPPI) is an independent professional policy-planning think-tank based in Jerusalem. It was created eight years ago as a project of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

One of its founding members was the renowned Israeli thinker, visionary Prof. Yehezkel Dror, a frequent adviser to the Israeli cabinet and prime ministers, and the only Israeli to be a member of the International Institute of Strategic Studies and of the Club of Rome. Dror was instrumental in helping devise and formulate the mission of the institute, which is "to ensure the thriving of the Jewish People and the Jewish civilization."

I specifically mention Dror's involvement in the institute to point out that the members of the institute, then as today, were and are profoundly committed to the importance of their work.

The way in which the institute tries to ensure the "thriving of the Jewish People" is by "by engaging in professional strategic thinking and planning on issues of primary concern to world Jewry. Each year, as part of an annual assessment, the institute publishes essays of immediate and dramatic concern for the Jewish People.

One of the distinctive qualities of the various reports published by the institute is that they are "action-oriented, placing special emphasis on identifying critical options and analyzing their potential impact on the future, developing professional strategic and long-term policy perspectives."

One can read and hear Dror's language throughout the mission statement of the institute.

Thus, the institute's various reports and annual assessments are expressly intended to aid communal leaders – lay and professional – and even politicians in making difficult decisions, helping steer the Jewish People in our respective communities through the always-clouded horizons. The key "weakness" of the institute, of course, is that it can only offer advice. It has no way to get community decision makers to actually heed it.

The contents of the 2011-2012 Annual Assessment testify to the institute's earnest approach to its research:

- Foreword by ambassadors Dennis Ross and Stuart Eizenstat;
- 2011-12 integrated "net" assessment;
- Selected indicators of world Jewry – 2011-12;
- The Jewish People's agenda: dilemmas and suggested policy directions:
- Geopolitical turmoil in the Middle East – developments in the geopolitical arena and their possible implications for Israel and the Jewish People (2011-12);
- Creating Jewish meaning in the U.S. and Europe – emerging adults, cultural creativity and the Jewish future in the U.S. and Europe;
- Developments in Israel: (a) Analysis: a new political landscape; (b) New proposed Knesset bills and Israeli democracy; (c) Summer 2011 in Israel: the revolt of the "undeprived" – what it was, how it was, what's left; (d) The People's army? Orthodox soldiers and religious dilemmas in the IDF; (e) Science and technology policy in a Jewish People context, and
- Developments to watch.

It is impossible to summarize or even touch slightly upon the highlights of each of the reports in this space.

Ross and Eizenstat set the overall tone of the report in their foreword. "By 2011, it became clear that the geopolitical threats may be as great as at any time since Israel's founding in 1948 – with upheaval in the Arab Middle East and the rising tide of the Muslim Brotherhood, which ideologically remains fundamentally hostile to Israel; with the stockpiling of hundreds of thousands of rockets near Israel's northern and southern borders, and the uncertainty of what will emerge in Syria; and with the question of whether force will be needed to resolve the potentially existential threat from Iran.

"While the Annual Assessment identifies the difficult geopolitical dilemmas and challenges our people faces, other measures may look more hopeful this year. Statistics show an increase of 600,000 in the global Jewish population over the past several years, from 12.9 million to 13.647 million [in 2010]."

Canada's Jewish population in 2010 (375,000) was the third largest in the Diaspora after the United States (5.275 million) and France (483,500). Our community, along with Mexico, are the only Diaspora communities projected by the institute to grow in size by the year 2020.

The institute projects the population of world Jewry to reach 13.917 million by the year 2020.

The JPPI report is laden with information, analysis and insight. It amounts to a hand outstretched offering ideas, suggestions, heartfelt pleas and hope on behalf of the Jewish people.

In the words of Ross and Eizenstat: "The 2011-12 assessment is a remarkable statement on the direction of world Jewry and what needs to be done to foster its well-being. The question, of course, is whether those in a position to act on its recommendations will do so."

The report should be read. It can be found at www.jppi.org.il.

UJA campaign off to quick start, officials say

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual fundraising campaign is off to its best start in many years, according to Bruce Leboff.

A co-chair for Campaign 2013, he announced at the annual UJA campaign launch Aug. 21 that $25 million had already been raised from more than 2,600 donors.

"We've been asking donors, where they can, to consider an increase of at least 10 per cent," said Leboff, whose co-chair is Sarena Koschitzky.

Liza Fromer talks with Jon Voight
[Jen Arron photo]

"It's so vital that we all take responsibility," Leboff told a crowd of more than 1,000 people gathered at the Fairmont Royal York for the launch.

The event featured an interview of actor Jon Voight by television host Liza Fromer and a performance by Hagit Yasso, 22-year-old Israeli Idol winner, a native of Sderot and the daughter of Ethiopian immigrants.

D.J. Schneeweis, new consul general of Israel for Toronto and Western Canada, made his first public appearance at the launch, emphasizing the importance of Jewish communities like the one in Toronto to Israel and Israelis. "More and more Israelis are coming to realize that... the strength and the well-being of this community is directly relevant to Israel," he said.

Last August, The CJN reported that the 2012 campaign had raised $7.8 million as of the campaign launch – only about one-third of this year's amount to date.

Campaign officials said that's because the pace of collections is ahead of last year, although the amount raised has also increased moderately.

In an e-mail exchange following the launch, Steven Shulman, UJA's campaign director and counsel, explained that this year's campaign is up $1.8 million in terms of comparing gifts from the same group of donors last year.

"We're out of the gates faster in terms of bringing in pledges," he said. "That's very important, because it creates momentum and gives canvassers an opportunity to reach out to new donors."

He added that "UJA has reverted to our past successful practice of reaching out to as many leading donors as early as possible, prior to the campaign launch... focusing on a greater number of leadership gifts early ensures that our volunteer canvassers and professionals can reach out to the entirety of the community more effectively in the precious months we have remaining."

Money raised in the annual campaign is used in the Jewish community here, in Israel, and internationally.

Speaking at the launch, women's philanthropy chair Laurie Sheff said that Toronto's federation has the third-largest annual campaign in North America.

Voight – an Academy-Award winner and the father of actor Angelina Jolie – said at the launch that his association with Israel dates back to 1987, when he was invited to appear on Chabad's annual telethon for the first time.

But his association with the Jewish community goes back to his childhood, when his father was a golf pro at a German Jewish country club in Scarsdale, NY.

Voight, who was born in 1938, said that, because of his father's work, "one of the first things we knew was what antisemitism was."

He also told of filming a movie in 1991 in Moscow, where he ended up having dinner with a group of UJA-affiliated rabbis who were there to help Soviet Jews.

"I really do feel like I've had a certain kind of destiny come my way because of my deep need to protect the truth of what Judaism stands for. It stands for love of life, it stands for liberty, for treating your neighbour in the way you'd like to be treated. It stands for charity. It stands for every good thing."

Voight called Israel "God's gift to all mankind, because Israel is a... reminder of the survival of the Jewish People."

He called on everyone – Jew and non-Jew alike – "to keep Israel safe and free to worship democracy and freedom forever."

B'nai Brith gets $5.4M for Alzheimer's care

Carolyn Blackman

Ottawa is giving B'nai Brith Canada $5.4 million to develop new technologies for Alzheimer's care, Gary Goodyear, minister of state for the Federal Economic Development Agency for Southern Ontario, said last week in Toronto.

Anne Snowdon

Mark Adler

The announcement was made Aug. 23 at B'nai Brith's new 43-bedroom Alzheimer's facility on Bathurst Street north of Finch Avenue.

The federal money will allow B'nai Brith to create the Centre of Innovative Excellence for Alzheimer's Care, housed within the B'nai Brith home.

The centre will be managed in partnership with the Ivey International Centre for Health Innovation, which is part of the Richard Ivey School of Business at the University of Western Ontario.

B'nai Brith Alzheimer's health care facility

The funds will be used to complete construction of the centre and hire eight employees, who will lead collaborations among industry, research and not-for-profit partners.

Within the centre, partners will develop, test and commercialize new Alzheimer's technologies, products, and care approaches, with the ultimate goal of reaching international markets, officials said.

York Centre MP Mark Adler said that the "announcement demonstrates [the] government's commitment to unleashing the potential of Canadian innovation to help Alzheimer's patients and their caregivers."

Anne Snowdon, chair of Ivey's International Centre for Health Innovation, said the centre will be one of the most important strategic centres of health-care excellence in Canada.

"I am speaking not only as a registered nurse, but also as the daughter of an Alzheimer's patient. It is my professional and personal goal to create this centre of excellence," Snowdon said.

"[Alzheimer's patients] deserve optimal quality of life, [and their families] should be able to rest assured that their loved ones are being properly cared for."

Whenever our vulnerable have needed us...

$3,180,000 IN 1962 for Jewish needs at Home and

Launch of 1962 UJA Annual Campaign

It's been suggested that a society will ultimately be judged by how it treats its most vulnerable members.

Since its inception 95 years ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been assisting Jewish Toronto's most vulnerable – whether they are abused women, families struggling to make ends meet; children who are going to school without a proper breakfast, or isolated seniors living on the fringe of society.

UJA Federation partners with over 100 agencies like Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) where we allocate $4.7 million, including nearly $2 million for direct relief to our most vulnerable. Together we are providing those in need with a hand up so that they can transform their lives and live in dignity.

On behalf of those whose lives have been changed, we say thank you for your gift to United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto.

Quebec votes

Five days remain before Quebecers vote, on Sept. 4, to elect a new provincial government. As of this writing, the race is very close. It is too close to call. In the last few days, each of the three main parties – the Liberal party, the Parti Québécois (PQ) and the Coalition Avenir Québec – has led in the polls. The two other main contending parties – Québec solidaire and Option nationale – the latter viewed as being more aggressive than the PQ in promoting the separatist agenda, are given no chance by pundits to play a major governmental role, but could influence the election outcome.

It is no overstatement to write that the upcoming election is one of the most important for Quebec – and it must be added for Canada too – in at least 30 years.

Although Pauline Marois, the PQ leader has openly campaigned about her desire for Quebec sovereignty and the possibility of a further referendum to achieve it, it has been her unselfconscious ardour in promoting the curbing of minority rights that has attracted the attention of Canadians from all walks of life.

Not surprisingly, minority communities in Quebec have been affronted by the PQ leader's willingness to curtail rights that are enshrined and guaranteed to them in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and Quebec's own Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

Early on in the campaign, Marois announced that she would restrict access to English-language CGEPs. She then pronounced that she would restrict the democratic rights of Quebec individuals to stand for office on the basis of language. She backpedalled on the latter pronouncement, but not on the former.

Marois's demand for French-language proficiency tests and her decision to introduce a charter of secularism, proposing to ban religious symbols in the public service, with the apparent exception of Christian symbols, have offended the sensibilities of a great many in the province and beyond, including the various minority groups.

In her campaign stops, Marois has urged voters to choose a government "that will defend the interests of Quebec."

We would agree with that statement.

In the same way that all provincial governments strive to defend and advance the interests of their respective provinces, so too should the government of Quebec. But surely, defending the interests of Quebec cannot require stripping away the fundamental rights of large pockets of its people.

No great society can flower in a soil of intolerance and prejudice.

That soil is certainly not the soil of the Quebec that we all know, need and love.

United Church boycott (1)

It was with great sadness that I read of the decision by the United Church of Canada to endorse a series of recommendations that include a boycott of products from the Israeli settlements in the West Bank ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23). I view this decision from my personal perspective and my professional role as the executive director of the Christian Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, and while I claim no particular expertise in international affairs, I cannot help but wonder how choosing sides in a foreign conflict will help bring them together to reconcile their differences. I have devoted much of my career to listening to the perspectives of other faith communities. While the commissioners of the United Church drew on their own sources of wisdom, I thought about Felicia and Erwin and Max. These are people with whom I work. These are people who survived boycotts. They survived the Holocaust. I know how much the thought of the United Church boycotting Israel has hurt them. And I can't turn my back on that. Perhaps someone from the United Church can come and speak to me and Felicia and Max and Erwin. Perhaps they can help us understand how the boycott of goods produced in Israeli settlements will help resolve the situation in the Middle East.

United Church boycott (2)

In responding to the United Church recent actions, which include a boycott of products from the Israeli communities in the West Bank, we have to remember, as noted in previous issues of The CJN, that probably only a few hundred people are involved in these actions ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23). Even so, we should point out to the United Church that the re-establishment, after 2,000 years, of Israel as a Jewish state is the direct result of events in Europe: 2,000 years of Christian churches preaching hatred of Jews, culminating in the greatest atrocity in human history. If the Palestinians want a fair deal, all they have to do is stop preaching their own brand of hatred and stop sending the rockets.

Israel needs communities in Judea, Samaria

The CJN's Aug. 23 editorial, "Morally Irrelevant," launches into a diatribe against "settlements" before noting that the United Church's boycott against them is misguided. The editor claims that the expansion of Jewish communities is a foolish policy, that they are a drain on the Israeli economy and that they alienate Israel's supporters worldwide.

It is interesting that the editorial speaks about "history" without ever mentioning the fact that the West Bank, known by its proper name of Judea and Samaria, is the ancestral cradle of Jewish civilization. It is in this contested territory that the Jewish People came into being, where the Patriarchs and Matriarchs are buried, where the House of David ruled, the prophets prophesied and the Maccabees and Bar Kochba fought for Jewish freedom. The presence of Jewish communities in the highlands provides security for the Gush Dan area, which houses 80 per cent of Israel's Jewish population. Regarding the economy, few would argue that Israel should forfeit its rights to the Negev or the Galilee because they are not economically rewarding. Similarly, the resettlement of Judea and Samaria has national value, regardless of economic cost. As for international opinion, it seems unreasonable to bar Jews from living in their homeland in order to curry political favour. Let us not forget that most of Israel's decisions to secure its own security and well-being have been taken in opposition to world opinion.

At a time when the Jews of Judea and Samaria are so maligned, it would behoove The CJN to stand up for Jewish rights. As a Jewish warrior said more than 2,000 years ago: "We have neither taken foreign land nor seized foreign property, but only the inheritance of our fathers, which at one time had been unjustly taken by our enemies."

Notes from a hospital bed

It is 3:01 p.m., my eyes suddenly pop open and I'm looking at the clock. Looming above me is the chief thoracic surgeon, who looks like an aging Green Bay Packers' linebacker about to sack a quarterback, me. Fortunately, I already met him, respect him and trust him.

"This is Dr –," the orderly says, "and he's going to remove the tube draining blood from your lung."

Barry Rubin

And remove it he does. His teeth are bared, he growls, his huge hands reach out and literally tear it out of me. It hurts, but I must admit he is skillful, and the pain is gone in seconds. Before the sting ends, he sews me up. The orderly puts on the gauze, and for the first time in three days, I enjoy the ultimate human luxury – not being tied to some piece of medical equipment by a tube. It is heaven.

The staff is good, though not all charming. I don't like talking to doctors. They bring out the pessimism in me, even despair. I am kept on a safe, steady line of treatment with good advice, thanks to my mother-in-law, who is a lung expert, has flown over from New York and keeps giving her calming professional opinion.

I quickly realize two things. First, most of us are years out of date in our medical knowledge and thus don't realize how much progress has been made. My mother-in-law muses that her own father wrote a book about lung cancer 40 years ago.

And I ask, "There must have been a lot of progress since then?"

"Oh no," she says, "there hasn't." My heart sinks. "But there's been incredible progress in the last five to 10 years."

The second thing is that the best-intended doctors often don't know what they are talking about outside their own speciality. My two thoracic surgeons overruled my two general internists and proved to be 100 per cent right. On the other hand, those two internists did save my life so I am grateful to them also.

The great weakness of the Israeli system – and it has many strengths far beyond the British and the American – is evident when you go from the level of general practitioner to a specialist. When I first made my appointment with my lung doctor, it was to have been one month away. That might have killed me. I went to my wife's doctor, and he had me in the emergency room within three hours, getting proper treatment. The woman doctor from the health fund was wonderful about getting me fast appointments, too.

The Israeli system is small enough to be managed and not so easy to abuse. Yes, there are incompetents and indifferent personnel, but Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv, despite the often-callous night floor staff, is the only hospital I'd want to be in. Many of the most talented of the doctors here and in other hospitals left the former Soviet Union because they just weren't welcome there.

It's probably also the only hospital where they start asking you about contemporary Middle East developments while treating you. I have had great genealogy discussions with some medical personnel about our ancestors. At least three of the kindest technicians were Arabs – two men with crosses and a woman with a hijab. Perhaps there were more. I don't know.

Mr. Ibrahim, my neighbour to the right, is a real gentleman. Born in Istanbul of an Ashkenazi family, he is a lean, distinguished man, perhaps in his early 80s. He went to French schools during Istanbul's golden age and speaks Ladino, 15th-century Judeo-Spanish, native-level Turkish, perfect English, beautiful French and not one word – not one – of Hebrew. They moved him next to me so that I could translate for him.

He never loses his cool or his dignity. He tells me his life story. His father had a good American appliance franchise that he inherited. He loves Turkey, but has no illusions about its current rulers. He has many Turkish friends, but one day he realized his family had no future there so they came to the Land of Israel.

His two happily married, beautiful daughters dote on him. He had fallen in his garden. We find we know people and events in common since I wrote a book about Istanbul. One night I read him to sleep with first-person accounts his own father never told him about the labour battalions, virtual concentration camps where Turkish Jews, Armenians and Greeks were forcibly sent during World War II.

He is released within a few days.

My other neighbour is Mr. Meir, another fine gentlemen. These men, only a decade older than I, have such wonderful manners. How much I, and my generation, have lost! He was born in Casabalanca and he speaks Arabic, French and Hebrew with equal facility. He offers me a cup of tea, which I find touching. But I fear the hot drink. He, too, is surrounded by his loving family.

He tells me a story that makes me sob a moment. I ask when he arrived in Israel. As a refugee, he responds, in the week of his bar mitzvah. And the first thing he did was to celebrate his bar mitzvah here. (My son was to celebrate his bar mitzvah last week and I feared I would not be there.) I find something comforting in the coincidental symbolism.

He, too, is soon released.

Then comes the ordeal. A very elderly man is brought into the room on the left side of my bed. He is tall and spare, wearing a narrow black silk skullcap, looking every inch like a biblical portrait of Abraham, so straight and stiff as to resemble a human log. All night long, he moans piteously. He recounts the story of his life, a few words at a time. His daughters and perhaps sons-in-law or sons gather around him. They praise him, express their love for him and beg his forgiveness.

"We love you, father," they say. "You could not have been better to us. We are so grateful to you!"

On and on, hour after hour, it goes as he mumbles one prayer and then another. I listen fascinated, captured by every word. My double sleeping pill has no effect at all. Finally, at midnight, long after the visiting hours end – though no one dared ask them to leave – they all leave. But one young, religiously garbed daughter remains to tend him all night. She wears the hair net covering of the religious. Her face is ravaged with sadness.

An entire century of a family is laid out before my unwilling ears. It breaks my heart, but there is something inspiring in it, something of the essence of life beyond all the foolishness and external matters by which we divert ourselves.

Only family matters.

Only love matters.

Only good deeds matter.

I finally can bear no more. I go around the curtain and I address the young, hollow-eyed daughter with the traditional Hebrew words of hope for the mercy of the Creator of the Universe, for full healing and for a miracle.

But I see by the look of hopelessness in her eye, even her deeply religious, believing-with-a-perfect-faith eye, that no miracle is expected here.

I return to my bed, fall asleep. Three hours later I awake briefly and hear him still mumbling.

Again, I fall asleep, and when I wake up 10 hours later, he is gone. She is gone. And someone else is in a new bed in the place he occupied. May the Creator of the universe comfort this fine man's family and bring him his true reward for having lived such a good life.

My eyes open, and I look at the clock on the wall opposite me. It is 3:01 p.m. Two giant men loom above me. "This is your thoracic surgeon," the mighty orderly says. Rip, tear and the hole in my side is healed.

But the holes in our hearts, the pain in our souls are not so easily mended.

A few minutes later, they take me down for a CT scan. I wait for the results as they confer, begging for the half-dozen conferring doctors to just give me one sentence of summary. The kindly deputy director, a wonderfully decent man, looks at me for a moment and says, "You are much better now," then returns to the conference. Frustrated, I fall asleep.

Three hours later, my wife wakes me. They can't find any more damage, she explains, just the tumour on the lung, the emptied-out blood, the scar tissue.

After a bit of bureaucracy, the kind desk nurse holds up a brown envelope. "You can go home," she says. "Come back each week for an X-ray. Begin your therapy."

I can barely walk, but my wife helps me down the hall, into a wheelchair, out the door and into the ever startlingly bright Tel Aviv sunshine.

I, Mr. Meir and Mr. Ibrahim have been given another chance to go into the world and do some good, to do some right.

Mr. "Abraham" is on his way to somewhere else, somewhere better I hope, where he will reap the reward of his long life of good deeds.

They release me to go home, rest and begin my therapy. Thanks to our Creator for our lives and thanks to our Creator for the chances we are given, often more than we merit, to transcend those lives by good deeds, integrity, solidarity with those who stand for the just and the free, and for love for our fellows. This is not about fame, this is not about wealth, this is not about power. It is about how – or whether – at the end, those who know us best love us best.

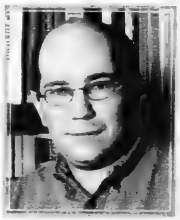
PQ ethnocentrism could bring Jews and Muslims together

Amid a glorious summer, with great weather, fabulous festivals and deliciously lazy days, the collective blood pressure of most Quebec Jews spiked, as the provincial election contest heated up, referendum talk mounted and property values prepared to nosedive. You don't need the honed-by-history, trained-by-trauma instincts of a long-oppressed people to hear the demagoguery and nativism in the rhetoric of Pauline Marois and her Parti Québécois. All you need are the sensibilities of a humanist, the decency of a democrat, the passions of a liberty-lover. During the first great Palestinian terrorist onslaught of the 1970s, novelist Cynthia Ozick said Jews aren't paranoid, but narapoid – a term she coined to mean when you think people are out to get you, and they are.



The Jews of Quebec live in a gilded cage. For many, Canadian niceness and the average Quebecer's generosity generate many blessings: the standard of living is high, quality of life is good, community infrastructure is deep and Jewish identity is strong. Yet the nastiness of Quebec politics – and the ever-present, shouted today, perhaps whispered tomorrow, threat of separation, erodes community self-confidence and individual self-respect. Politically, most Jews are held hostage, forced to support the tired, ineffectual, tainted-by-corruption Liberal government of Premier Jean Charest, because the alternative isn't just worse, but potentially catastrophic.

The separatist threat is debilitating enough, but Marois has raised the trauma considerably with her Charter of Secularism. The notion of banning Jewish, Muslim, and Sikh symbols in government offices but not, dare I say it, God forbid, the crucifix, because of its "cultural" significance – not its religious meaning of course – would be laughable if it were not so offensive. Marois has made it clear that she would invoke one of the least democratic planks in any modern democracy – the Charter of Rights' Notwithstanding Clause – to impose her offensive, selective, Christianocentric, vision on Quebecers.

Gil Troy

in Montreal

Fundamental rights of free expression and religious liberty shouldn't be up for grabs. All Quebecers of good conscience should vote against Marois' medievalism. This threat to peace, order and good government should also motivate Canadians across the country to rally against the Notwithstanding Clause. Provincial legislatures shouldn't be able to suspend fundamental rights temporarily. The clause mocks the notion of constitutional guarantees.

I don't get it. I thought the new generation of young, hip, cosmopolitan Quebeckers rejected their baby boomer predecessors' extremism. Yes, there were historic imbalances between Anglophones and Francophones that needed correcting. And yes, these young, prospering, sophisticated Francophones have benefited from their elders' boldness. But progress occurred, a new world developed, and now, this divisive, destructive demagoguery threatens all the good and goodwill that exist, while obscuring important work that needs to be done in improving the health-care system, cultivating the economy and making the infamous Quebec bureaucracy more respectful of individual citizens and their rights.

History teaches that a lynch mob atmosphere against some citizens ultimately hurts all citizens. So many people, be they of venerable French lineage or fresh off the boat, who have had run-ins with Quebec tax authorities or Quebec welfare boards or Quebec parking authorities understand that the province's power dynamics are too skewed toward officious bureaucrats and against regular folk. We need a grand government worthy of its marvellous citizens, not a banana republic. Marois' ethnocentrism and separatist talks diminishes individuals and the rule of law while preventing an important debate about this problem and many others.

There is one silver lining amid these gathering northern clouds. In targeting the hijab and the kippah, Marois has provided Muslim and Jews an opening for a much-needed dialogue. I have long wondered why every conversation between Muslims and Jews has to be about Israelis and Palestinians. We have many common challenges that could invite productive, meaningful exchanges. We should talk together about the tensions of preserving traditions in the modern world, of difficulties navigating smaller, more insular but nurturing communities along with larger, more expansive and empowering, yet sometimes alienating, communities.

In mobilizing together against Marois' ethno-ugliness, Muslims and Jews might find some Canadian common ground and build strong ties that could help alleviate Middle East tensions. That would make us not just narapoid, but what I would call "fedended." That's when by defending yourself, you make yourself – and others – stronger.

Do we really have room for hate?

In June, my son sent round a Facebook post with the quotes from Israel's chief rabbis debating who thought it was more of a catastrophe that non-Orthodox rabbis were now being paid a state salary – just like all Orthodox rabbis. His posting asked, "Who hates Reform Judaism more?" My posting asked, "Is this a contest I can win?"

Let's start with the whole idea of a Chief Rabbinate. It's funded by the government – which means from the taxes of an already-overtaxed population – but the vast majority of Israelis are not Orthodox and utterly ignore that same Chief Rabbinate, except when they have to get married (often running to Cyprus to do so) or buried (and they're now finding loopholes even to that). The institution is so flawed, so patriarchal, so biased, so unbearably pre-modern that it's barely salvageable.

Corrupt politicians "buy" votes by getting local rabbis to support them. Religious factions fight each other other publicly, closing down schools, after-school clubs and organizations that don't please them. Religious councils grant seats to favourites, give grants to favourites, and ignore the others. Local mashgichim are appointed to hotels and restaurants without these establishments having any say as to whom they get. And of course thousands of Israelis – both secular and haredi – completely ignore everything these rabbis say.

And let's not ignore the fact that the new state salaries for these Reform and Conservative rabbis is going to come not from the budget of the Chief Rabbinate but from the Ministry of Sports and Culture. (Thank goodness I am not paid by the Canadian ministry. I don't play hockey and I'm a pretty poor curler. I'm terrible at art and I don't play a instrument, either. Yikes. Well maybe I'm cultural enough to get a paycheque.) And these salaries go only to rural rabbis (don't you dare dream of being paid to serve in Jerusalem, for example.)

But we accept small victories, because we know the road is long and hard, and we know how much we worked just for this "bone" from a religious ministry that often spews venom and places all manner of obstacles when it comes to their fellow, non-Orthodox Jews.

Now I know people will accuse me of Orthodox-bashing. Let's get real: just who is bashing whom? Rabbi Shlomo Amar, the Sephardi chief rabbi, called Reform and Conservative Jews "destroyers and saboteurs of Judaism," noting that the non-Orthodox movements "are poisoning the well of holiness and taking people to a nethermost pit." Most remarkable was his assertion that paying non-Orthodox rabbis from government money was more serious than the Palestinan threat.

Gil Kariv, director of the Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism, wrote in response: "We will continue to build communities and to establish centres of education, convert immigrants from the former Soviet Union and to work toward social justice and tolerance."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

In an opinion piece published in Ha'aretz, Kariv writes: "The attorney general's decision will not end discrimination in marriages and divorces; it will not provide relief from the outrageous lack of justice in the ultra-Orthodox community's evasion of military service. Nor will it ease the distress of the new immigrants who lack a religious classification. It does not provide an answer to religious radicalization, racism or the exclusion of women, which are part of some rabbis' daily routine.

"These issues and others are still waiting for the people to come to their senses and say that enough is enough. But this underscores the importance of the decision – the future of democracy depends on the diversity of the faces of Judaism in Israel and on the establishment of a moderate, humane and tolerant Jewish voice."

The chief rabbis and their friends in high places can cry foul all they like. They can, and likely will, try to thwart this measure in any way available to them. But time marches on, and the modern State of Israel is getting more and more impatient with medieval theocracies. The only way that the Jewish state can stay Jewish and also democratic, egalitarian, diverse and modern is to disable the whole structure and purpose of the Chief Rabbinate and let all Jews in the Jewish state freely choose the form and manner in which they will practise Judaism, as their Jewish brothers and sisters all over the Diaspora can do.

Turkey's 'true believers'

As my Istanbul-bound Turkish Airlines flight from Toronto began its descent, I caught a glimpse of a mosque in the bright sunshine, one of nearly 3,000 mosques scattered around Istanbul.

A few days later, I visited one of Istanbul's marquee tourist attractions, the Blue Mosque, which is adorned with several imposing domes and a profusion of minarets.

But of all the mosques I saw in this bustling and exotic city, the so-called Jewish mosque, found in an upscale neighbourhood of gleaming condominiums and fine shops, may well have been the most unusual one.

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

A plain two-storey building with a beige exterior, a single white minaret thrusting into the sky and such decorative touches as fancy stone flourishes and four stolid columns shielding the front door, this is a mosque frequented by the donmehs. Or so I was told by a reliable source in Istanbul.

Members of an intensely secretive community that shuns contact with outsiders, the donmehs are descendants of Jews who converted to Islam in the mid-17th century.

Their story beggars belief.

Shabtai Zvi, a rabbi and a kabbalist born in the Ottoman Empire town of Smyrna in 1626, reached adulthood when the approach of messianic times seemed tantalizingly imminent. In 1648, when he was 22, he told his followers he was the messiah. The rabbis of Smyrna, fearing his deviant creed and his charismatic powers, excommunicated him and his flock.

Banished from the Jewish community, he travelled the world, landing in Istanbul, previously known as Constantinople, in 1666. Arrested by the authorities on suspicion of conspiring to overthrow the sultan, he was given a stark choice: convert to Islam or face execution.

He converted, disillusioning many of his followers, who now considered him a false messiah. Ardent loyalists, consisting of some 300 families, embraced his new faith and referred to themselves as ma'aminim, or "true believers."

Muslims called them donmehs, a Turkish word meaning "to turn." Outwardly, like the Jewish conversos of Spain, the donmehs made a show of embracing their new religion, living by the Muslim calendar and praying in mosques. Privately, they hewed to certain Jewish rituals, incorporating elements of the Kabbalah and Sufism into their beliefs, and recited prayers in Hebrew and Ladino.

After Shabtai Zvi's death in 1676, the donmehs splintered into three sects. The Yakubis scrupulously observed Sunni Muslim religious obligations. The Karakas, seemingly less devoted to Islam, attracted acolytes in Poland, including Jacob Frank, who eventually converted to Christianity. The Kapanci, a hybrid subgroup, adopted the practices of both the Yakubis and the Karakas.

By the 19th century, the donmehs were concentrated in Salonika, in present-day Greece, and were prominent in the textile, timber and tobacco trades. Clannish and insular, they lived in the same neighbourhoods, maintaining their own network of mosques, schools, communal courts and cemeteries.

Numbering upward of 15,000 when the 20th century dawned, the donmehs, having been branded incorrigible deviants by rabbis, were alienated from the Jewish community.

In 1914, the chief rabbi of the Ottoman Empire accused them of immorality, sexual promiscuity and perversity, dishonesty, blasphemy and trickery.

According to American historian Marc David Baer, the author of a book on the donmehs, they were increasingly assimilated into Muslim society as they internalized Islamic values and intermarried with Muslims. Indeed, some donmehs advanced into senior positions in the Ottoman bureaucracy and armed forces and in Sufi orders.

Drawn to progressive political ideas, they joined the ranks of the Committee for Union and Progress, or Young Turks, which pressed for reforms in the period leading up to World War I. Javid Bey, supposedly of donmeh origin, was the minister of finance in the first Young Turk government.

It has also been alleged that Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of Turkey's secular republic in 1923, was of donmeh descent as well. The allegation stems from the fact that Ataturk attended a school in Salonika established by Semsi Efendi, a donmeh who may have been one of his teachers.

With the end of Turkey's war of national independence, a war that defined its current geographic boundaries, Turkey and Greece agreed to a massive population exchange. Upward of 500,000 Muslims in Greece were transferred to Turkey, while about one million Greek Christians in Turkey were sent to Greece.

As part of this historic exchange, the donmehs were resettled in Turkey, having been forced to leave Salonika after Salonika's chief rabbi decreed that donmehs were Muslims rather than Jews. In the main, they settled in Istanbul, Izmir and Ankara, Turkey's capital.

In retrospect, the donmehs were fortunate to have left Salonika. Two decades later, during the Nazi occupation, more than 90 per cent of the Jews in the city were deported to and murdered in concentration camps in Poland. The donmehs would have suffered the same fate had the Nazis classified them as Jews.

But Jews they definitely were not. During the Ataturk era, from 1923 to 1938, a donmeh descendant, Teyfik Rustu Aras, was Turkey's ambassador to the Soviet Union and Britain and served as deputy foreign minister and foreign minister.

Oddly enough, however, the donmehs were affected by the punitive 1942 wealth tax imposed on minorities: Jews, Greeks and Armenians.

Today, nearly four centuries after Shabtai Zvi proclaimed himself the messiah, the donmehs have been completely absorbed into the Turkish Muslim fold. "There are few who keep the old traditions," said Rifat Bali, an Istanbul historian who writes on Jewish topics. "The rest have been assimilated."

The Donmeh mosque in Istanbul

Izak Kolman, an adviser to Turkey's chief rabbi, claims there are three categories of donmehs in Turkey today. The first group denies its Jewish antecedents altogether. The second may still practise Jewish rituals in secrecy. The third openly acknowledges its Jewish ancestry.

The Jewish community has no formal connections with the donmehs. "We have no relationship with them," said Kolman.

Nonetheless, hardline Islamists and conspiracy theorists claim that their descendants control and have controlled the Turkish government. They also insist that Turkey's former foreign minister, Ismail Cem, was a donmeh, and that Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is a secret Jew.

Judging by these assertions, the donmehs continue to cast a shadow on contemporary Turkey.

Recession puts pressure on federation budget

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been spending much time on its budgeting process in the wake of the recession that began four years ago. The organization is now balancing greater need in the community with fewer dollars to spend each year.

The CJN met recently with senior federation staff members to discuss the amount raised in the annual campaign, and how budget and local allocations are affected.

In its 2012 campaign, which ended this summer, UJA raised $60.5 million. Of that, $3.3 million was earmarked by donors for specific causes. The rest constituted unrestricted gifts that are allocated according to needs determined by the federation and community volunteers.

The larger, unrestricted segment, makes the most difference to the community, explained Steven Shulman, campaign director and counsel.

Beginning in 2008, the entire philanthropic world was hit by the recession, Shulman said. "We've had challenges, but have been coming through better than the vast majority of organizations, because people recognize the primacy of UJA."

Federation has been tightening its belt to address what Shulman called a "diminution" of dollars. The 2011 campaign raised $63 million, $2.5 million more than this past year.

"We have a very lean staff, and almost 700 volunteer canvassers," said Shulman. As well, he added, there have been $2.2 million in "internal cuts" over the last four years, including eliminating the federation's legal department, to minimize costs.

As well, staff for the Joshua Institute of Jewish Communal Leadership and Top Bunk – a Jewish camp incentive program – were let go, although the programs are still running.

Steven Shulman

Most notably – and controversially – in 2009, the federation's Centre for Jewish Education (CJE) was downsized dramatically, and its annual budget was cut by more than $1 million.

Ted Sokolsky, the federation's president and CEO, said that the previous entity was "great for a different era. Schools are much stronger now, and have the resources to develop curriculum."

As well, Shulman added, costs have been cut by bringing in someone who works on contract instead of having a full-time staff member to organize events such as professional development days.

"None of this is at the expense of day schools," Shulman said, addressing concerns that have been raised.

Adam Minsky, senior vice-president of community capacity building, said the CJE has four priorities: affordability of Jewish education, developing a strategy for special education, school accreditation and supplementary education for kids who aren't in the day school system. Three of them relate to day schools, he pointed out, adding that the federation has increased the amount of money it allocates to day schools in recent years.

Despite overall cuts including $42,000 for seniors and $16,000 to the Committee for Yiddish, there were also allocation increases this past year. An extra $176,000 went toward providing financial assistance to vulnerable members of the community this year, and an additional $100,000 was allocated to women's abuse programs, Jeff Springer, senior vice-president of corporate affairs, said.

Jewish Family and Child's financial assistance program is "practically the only one of its kind in North America," Sokolsky said. Shulman added that more families have needed assistance this year, because severance packages are running out for middle-aged parents who lost their jobs in the recession and haven't found employment since.

Some of the federation's most ambitious projects, such as the new Schwartz-Reisman Centre at the 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, and the Prosserman JCC, which is expected to open in late 2014, are not funded through the annual UJA campaign.

With other pressing issues in the community – day school tuition, for example – where does the high cost of the new Jewish campuses fit in?

Sokolsky said the capital campaign for the new buildings and campuses have enhanced the UJA campaign by getting mega-donors to "reconnect with the Jewish community in a way they haven't before.

"When you have a big idea, you attract big money… This site [Lebovic] is finally going to anchor the northern Jewish community. It's an investment."

There's nothing I can do about the five and a half month wait.

Ontario doctors are working harder than ever for you and your family. But we all know that the demands of an aging population are only going to add more pressure on our health care system.

Here in Vaughan, wait times are far too long. In fact, out of 14 wait time performance targets, only five were met. Eight were worse than the previous year.

Now, Dalton McGuinty is planning to cut more than $1 billion dollars from OHIP.

Your doctor is working harder and harder to meet the demand. But these cuts will make wait times even longer. This is especially true for seniors waiting for important procedures like hip and knee replacement surgery.

Tough times squeeze JF&CS budget

Costs are up, revenues are down, says Cummings

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A climate of government budgetary cutbacks is making it a challenging time for the child welfare sector, says Richard Cummings, executive director of Jewish Family & Child.

With the province reducing expenditures, his agency's allocations have been reduced to a level of funding it received in 2010, Cummings said.

In addition to being a children's aid society for the Jewish community, JF&CS offers services for abused women, as well as family services and counseling, including financial assistance and rehabilitation, and Jewish hospice services.

Cummings said that in the current funding cycle, which began in mid-July, the reductions have been accompanied by an increase in expenditures for services, as well as for salaries, benefits, insurance and pensions.

"The bottom line is that costs are up and revenues are down," he said in an interview at the agency's head office.

Richard Cummings

Over the past year, he said, in anticipation of the budget allocations, the agency had to do some trimming. "We reduced our expenses through lay-offs and other savings, but we are concerned that with further hits, we could be presented with new and difficult challenges.

"We are now endeavouring to identify effective ways to implement changes without eroding the quality of the services we provide to the Jewish community."

Can you give Josh a home?

JF&CS seeks adoptive parents for foster child

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Sheryl Ederman, a practice team manager at Jewish Family & Child, is "shocked and perplexed" that efforts to get a 10-year-old boy adopted into a Toronto-area Jewish family have gone unrewarded.

Josh (not his real name) has been in foster care for more than a year, and JF&CS has fulfilled its mandate to try to reunite him with his family.

"That was not possible, so it's [the agency's] responsibility to connect [Josh] to another family. The primary focus of all adoption services is the best interest of the child."

Ederman said JF&CS has placed posters about Josh along Bathurst Street from Bloor Street to Richmond Hill, as well as sent out more than 22,000 email blasts, posted the plea on the agency's Facebook page, and made it the lead story in Family Matters, its newsletter, but there has been very little response.

"I do believe there is a 'forever home' for this child, but I may have to go outside of the GTA. He has a solid, dependable extended family in the GTA, who, if possible, wants to maintain a relationship with him, but they are unable to care for him," Ederman said.

"We'd like Josh to maintain family contact that is meaningful and beneficial, but his family has said they will not stand in the way of another family who may not want him to have any contact."

In describing Josh, Ederman said that he shows excitement and enthusiasm in everything he does. "He enjoys karate swimming, playing with Legos, listening to music, and much more.

"[He] is friendly, charismatic, loving and inquisitive. His smile and big, blue eyes are hard to resist."

Ederman said that Josh has had family challenges, and has demonstrated great resiliency as he has adjusted well to his life circumstances.

Josh requires a "forever family" that is able to provide structure, calmness and consistency, she said. "He would benefit from a two-parent family, and he would welcome siblings – especially older siblings that he can look up to as positive role models.

"Josh has some learning challenges and will require academic support. His adoptive family would need to be open to learning particular parenting strategies, be open-minded regarding extended family contact, and be loving and caring."

Ederman wonders why no one has stepped forward. "I believe we have a responsive community, but this [lack of response] throws me. I don't know what else to do."

She doesn't want to turn to an advertising agency, she said, because that would make her feel like she's trying to sell a product. "We are looking for a home for one of our children."

JF&CS can provide support to families who give children in care a home through adoption. "A financial subsidy, which is reviewed annually, is available to a family who is eligible," Ederman said.

"We want to encourage the right family to step forward, even if they are worried about finances. Our priority is finding the right match. We do this through a consensual home study process to assist in determining the best interest of the child."

Josh is anxious to settle into a family, she said. "He has been with a great foster family, but foster homes are temporary. We have to get him out of the system, and into a permanent home. Permanence is a safe, nurturing relationship intended to last a lifetime."

For information on adopting Josh, call 416-638-7800 and ask for intake.

Agency facing cutbacks

Cummings said the government must see the importance of maintaining these services. "Our voice needs to be heard. [They need to know] that the government should invest in services [directed] at the most vulnerable.

"I am distressed, but I can say without question that we will not put children and families at risk. We are passionately committed to providing child welfare services. It is a treasure to have the only Jewish child welfare agency in the country."

As a multi-service agency, said Cummings, "we have a unique approach to services that allows us to deliver effective responses. We don't want to lose the great programming, which provides a host of services beyond the children's agency envelope.

"We provide case management that allows us to address complex issues, we have a unique approach to services, and we deliver effective responses."

Cummings said that despite the challenges, he has always maintained trust in the agency's board of directors and the Jewish community to keep it afloat.

First Nations youth hosted at Camp George

She extended the invitation to the Aug. 18-19 powwow, which gave the Jewish visitors "a first-hand idea of a different culture and a different way of life," Poizner said.

Wheatley, who is aboriginal program co-ordinator at the Toronto Zoo, explained that powwows are open to anybody. "They're public presentations and sharing. It's just like a festival, except they have a sacred nature to them. They're immersed with cultural teachings."

In turn, Wheatley was invited to the Reform movement's Camp George for Shabbat dinner and services, "which was amazing," she said.

Rabbi Noam Katz – the dean of Jewish living at Camp George (which hosted two groups of First Nations youth this summer for activities and dialogue) and Leo Baeck Day School – said he was dazzled by some of the customs and traditions he witnessed at the powwow, and by having the chance to speak with Lakota elder Cliff Standingready. "I thought it was very inspiring.

"I realized there are so many points of intersection and commonality between aboriginal traditions and many of our own Jewish traditions... safeguarding the earth, respecting the elders and transmitting the old values and stories to the next generation."

The CCRJ came into the picture when Poizner and Fran Isaacs, chair of Temple Har Zion's social action committee, attended a meeting of the Reform movement's national social action committee.

In addition to the two Reform congregations, the BCS also includes Beit Rayim Synagogue, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Shaar Shalom Synagogue (all of which are Conservative), and Kehillat Shaarei Torah (which is Orthodox).

A total of almost 30 representatives of the two groups attended the powwow. Poizner and her husband Marty brought 50 backpacks filled with school supplies, donated by Ve'ahavta, as gifts.

Among other ceremonies, there was an honour dance for the Jewish group to thank them for developing the partnership and bringing the gifts.

Wheatley recalls feeling "so pleased, so happy, so proud" at the powwow. "It was a great opportunity [for visitors] to experience who we are in a very fun and welcoming atmosphere.

"I think partnership between communities that are connected by their hearts is really important, and I think the grass roots level is the most important way to get anything done."

Lakota elder Cliff Standingready took part in the powwow.

Israeli youths enjoy camp experience

Kortney Shapiro
Special to The CJN

There is nothing like spending the summer by a lake, jumping into pristine waters after having spent the day bonding with new friends, and kayaking until sunset.

This summer, 25 Israeli campers personally affected by terrorism, ranging in age from 12 to 17, and their five counsellors came to Canada with the support of the One Family Fund Camp Timberlane program.

One Family Fund acts as an extended family of Israeli victims of terror attacks, providing them with financial, emotional and physical support.

The organization supports the wounded and bereaved – those who have lost loved ones or who have directly been physically or emotionally affected by terror.

Founded in 2002, One Family Fund empowers victims of terror with rehabilitative programs and support networks to rebuild their lives, one family at a time. Now in its sixth year, the Camp Timberlane program bridges the ties between Israeli and Canadian youth and their families.

This year, 17 families generously opened their Toronto-area homes for a week to Israeli campers who were treated to a three-week camp experience in northern Ontario.

Before heading off to camp, the group did some sightseeing that included a visit to Toronto landmark Casa Loma and Niagara Falls.

The participants, who were greeted by the Toronto Jewish community with affection and warmth, also enjoyed shopping trips, a bowling night, barbecues and lunches, which were donated by sponsors and families.

Israeli youths at camp

Overseen by One Family Fund's signature events director Michael Rosen, the program was a great success, proving that community support can help people cope with personal issues.

Dina Sheer, an Israel-based One Family Fund staff supervisor, said that when she was presented with an opportunity to take part in the summer program, "I took it with two hands.

"It was an amazing experience to get to know more of the One Family Fund children. It is very intense, and I learned a lot from [the Israeli participants] and the Canadians [whose] kindness and warm welcome was so nice."

One of the participants, a 17-year-old counsellor-in-training, took part in the program for the second time.

"The [Canadian] campers were happy to have us there. They wanted us to teach them Hebrew and we learned English," she said.

"I did this [program] again because of the warm people… Everyone is amazing. It was the best summer I had in my life."

Efi Zarbiv, an Israeli-based One Family Fund staff member who accompanied the children from Israel, also found the program to be meaningful as well.

"The kids loved the activities and meeting new people," Zarbiv said.

"They participated in everything. It was great to see how happy they were."

In a letter to the families who hosted the children before and after their camp experience, and to the staff involved in bringing the entire program together, One Family Fund Canada executive director Pam Albert wrote that the "amazing experience" left her speechless.

And to the Israeli participants, she wrote that they "really are cherished by your Canadian community. When I visited you at Timberlane, I left with a full heart, knowing that you were having such a great experience."

As the summer comes to a close and the children return home, it is clear that this program is an essential part of the Jewish community both here and abroad, and provides children who have suffered through trauma to experience a carefree summer.

Shabbat service honours Jewish war vets

Sheri Shefa
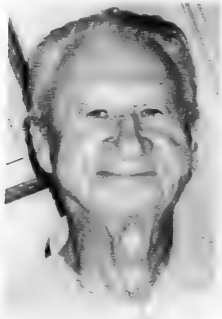
Staff Reporter

For the sixth time in as many years, George Stern, a Hungarian-native who survived the Holocaust as a hidden child and fought in Israel's War of Independence in 1948 before settling in Canada, is organizing a special Shabbat service at Beth Tikvah Synagogue to honour his fellow Jewish war veterans.



George Stern

Stern, who strongly believes that all Jewish war veterans living in Canada should be recognized and organized, has been a volunteer and member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada for about 13 years.

Since 2008, he has made it his mission to reach out to the hundreds of Israeli and Russian Jewish war veterans living in Canada.

Stern said that many members of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada – which, according to its website, functions as a "Jewish veterans association with all rights to operate independently, to recognize and assist the State of Israel in any way possible"– were machalniks, volunteers who fought in Israel's War of Independence after serving in World War II.

George Stern, far right, is pictured with Jewish war veterans at a special Shabbat service he organized in 2008 in honour of Canadian, Russian and Israeli Jews who fought for their countries.

But Stern has been working to recruit younger war veterans, Israeli-Canadians who have served in Israel's Six Day War in 1967, or the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

Stern, who is on Beth Tikvah's ritual committee, said since he took over organizing the Shabbat service in 2006, Canadians, Russians and Israelis have all participated.

He said in the years since he began trying to attract Israeli war veterans to join the Canadian organization, only about 25 have joined.

"But the Israelis don't show up [to the events]. The joined and they paid their dues, but they don't participate," Stern said.

Still, Stern is relentless in his mission to increase the organization's membership, which stands at about 140.

"It's very important to honour the veterans once a year, at least, and bring them together, and to teach the younger generations about the history," he said.

During the Nov. 10 service, the participating veterans – Stern is expecting about 50 – will march together before the service starts.

Stern will welcome the veterans and their families and Rabbi Jarrod Grover will address the gathering.

"My family will come, my six grandchildren will come," Stern said.

"It's important to show the younger generation, so they will not forget."

Stern said he's also looking forward to a vodka toast with his Russian war veteran buddies at the kiddush following the service.

The event will include an exhibit featuring pictures, articles and memorabilia supplied by the participating veterans.

Those interested in an aliyah l'Torah should contact Stern to make arrangements in advance.

The annual fee to be a member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada is $35.

For more information or to inquire about joining, call Stern at 416-223-7481 or email g.stern@hotmail.com.

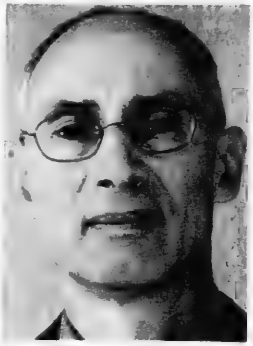
United Church position on Israel is unbalanced

Guest Voice



Harry Schachter

In the past few days, the United Church has drawn widespread condemnation from the Jewish community for its position on Israel and Palestine.

Those of us who define ourselves as progressive Zionists agree that there is much that is difficult and troubling in the church's position. But there is also much that we can approve of in the church's stand, and it's important to acknowledge that.

For example, we agree with the Church's Working Group on Israel/Palestine Policy that the establishment of a viable Palestinian state alongside a Jewish, democratic Israel is the means whereby the people of the region can look forward to a peaceful and productive future together. We further agree that this two-state future must be achieved through legitimate, good-faith negotiations and based on a foundation of justice, human dignity, human rights and international law.

It's gratifying to see a clear statement from the church that to question Israel's legitimacy or its right to exist is unacceptable. It's also heartening to see the church denounce the "ongoing aggression and incitement to violence" aimed at the State of Israel and its people from parties, individuals and governments in the region and around the world.

And on the difficult issue of the right of return for Palestinians, the church now supports a negotiated settlement that maintains the demographic integrity of Israel.

Nevertheless, when we look at the result of the debate and the final vote at the church's General Council this month, there are important points on which we disagree.

Here are a couple.

The church has voted to make a lot of demands on Israel. It calls on the Israelis to end all settlement construction as a necessary step toward entering into good faith negotiation, to dismantle the separation barrier where it crosses over the Green Line and to ensure there is equitable access to water resources. We can agree with all of that. But the council ultimately makes no demands whatsoever on the Palestinians. There is one all-too-brief mention in the Working Group report of the need for Palestinians (and Israelis) to reject violence, and there is barely any mention at all of the rejectionist factions such as Hamas that are so strong among the Palestinians. This is a gaping void in the church's position.

And then there are the proposals for economic boycott. My organization, JSpaceCanada, has from its very beginning opposed any form of boycott, divestment or sanctions (BDS) when it comes to Israel. The international BDS movement is simply too saturated with anti-Israel bias and rhetoric, and many of its participants reject the entire notion of a Jewish state.

The United Church, to its credit, acknowledges the problems with the BDS movement. Instead the church, first in its Working Group report and now at its General Council, advocates a more targeted economic boycott aimed at settlement products. This is a more nuanced and defensible position, but it's one that we respectfully reject. In practical terms, it is difficult if not impossible to enforce without also hurting Israelis outside the settlements. Most significantly, it serves only to isolate and harden Israel and its supporters when what is most urgently needed is close contact and diplomacy.

Many in the Jewish community have called for cutting off ties with the United Church. Our disagreements with the United Church are serious, but not talking will resolve nothing. Rather, this is a time when it's most important to maintain ties and to keep a dialogue going. That's the only way that we'll be able to work through our disagreements and build on those areas where we can surely make common cause.

Harry Schachter is on the co-ordinating committee of JSpaceCanada and a former television news producer.

Looking back on my summer as an intern

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Once a week, since I was a tiny toddler, I've walked, or wobbled in the really early years, into my kitchen and found The CJN lying open on the table.

As time passed, the table changed – from beige laminate to sleek glass – the appliances surrounding the table have been also been updated, but the paper has remained a fixture. So much so, that when my first CJN article as a freelancer was published almost three years ago, it felt like a huge milestone to my parents and to me, both as a journalist and as a member of Toronto's Jewish community. Here was my article in this stronghold of Canadian Jewish life, not to mention this staple in my kitchen.

From that day, I never looked back. I continued to write pieces frequently as a freelancer, interned at the paper for six weeks as part of my final year of study at Ryerson University's journalism program, and this summer, I was lucky enough to come back as an intern for almost four months.

[Josh Hochman photo]

Now that the summer is ending (I know, I too am trying to pretend it's not), and I'm preparing to move to Israel for a graduate program at Tel Aviv University (in fact, I'll probably be on the Tel Aviv beach by the time you read this), I'm taking a moment to reflect on what The CJN internship experience has meant to me.

I've had the pleasure of interviewing interesting, inspiring and exciting people from indie filmmakers and professional musicians to first- and second-grade students eager to make a difference in their communities.

I've had the opportunity to speak with artists and fashion designers, and even to report on a fancy kosher wine festival. Journalism can be a great way to meet new people and to go to events that you might not have otherwise made time for or even known about.

Writing for The CJN opened my eyes to the depth and the breadth of Jewish community life in Canada. Covering events at the celebration of Moroccan culture made me swell with pride at the diversity of our community. Although I am not Moroccan, I am Sephardi, and a part of me was humbled at how much interest the greater, mostly Ashkenazi Jewish, community took in Sephardi culture.

I was awed by the support I saw for the Jewish homeland at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk With Israel, and again with the love for Israel's injured war veterans that I witnessed at Beit Halochem's annual concert.

Even more than giving me the wonderful opportunities to explore and learn about Toronto's Jewish community, The CJN team has also supported me through my learning experience. I have never had a question go unanswered, and I've always been greeted with patience and understanding even when I've forgotten how to find something on my computer for the fifth or sixth time (OK, OK, maybe the seventh or eighth time).

The CJN helped me expand my skill set from reporting to include copy editing, proofreading, coordinating photos for articles and even helping to put together supplements.

But more importantly, what I've learned is that The CJN team is really a community, a family, in itself. Not a day has passed that I haven't felt appreciated and cared for, and I go forward knowing that even in Israel, I will stay connected to the great people I've met at the paper.

While I'm sad to be leaving, I can't wait for what's to come in Tel Aviv. Thank you to the readers, the interviewees and, of course, to everyone at The CJN for making the last four months so memorable!

Research student enjoys hands-on experience

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Toronto native Rachel Blinick was one of 10 Yeshiva University undergraduates who participated in the Summer Undergraduate Research Program (SURP), a biomedical research program at YU's Albert Einstein College of Medicine.

In addition to the 10 undergraduates, the program attracted 45 graduate students from a number of American colleges and universities to participate in cutting-edge scientific studies.

Blinick, who spoke with The CJN in Toronto just days before returning to New York to prepare for the final semester of a bachelor's degree in biology at YU, said she was humbled to be one of the few chosen to participate in the nine-week program that ended earlier this month.

"You had to have research experience, you had to have good grades, good recommendation letters and show that you're really interested in research. You get a stipend as well, so it's a prestigious position," Blinick said.

In the summer program, Blinick worked full time in a research laboratory at the Montefiore Medical Center in New York, where she joined Dr. Richard Gorlick's research group, which focuses on osteosarcoma, the most common type of bone cancer in children.

Rachel Blinick working in Yeshiva University laboratory

"I joined a project in which they were looking at cell-differentiation of growing stem cells," Blinick said.

She also attended weekly lectures by renowned scientists who spoke about their latest discoveries, and she worked closely with graduate students and post-doctoral fellows.

Blinick said her role in the study was to analyze genes expressed by mesenchymal stem cells (stem cells that can differentiate into a variety of cell types) and chondroblasts (cartilage-producing cells that come from stem cells), to test for specific markers using flow cytometry, a technique used to identify, separate and count cells based on detecting and measuring the fluorescence emitted with a laser light beam.

"I really liked the research because it was very translational, meaning we were actually working with patient samples and bone marrow from patients. It was something that was going to be used to treat patients," she said.

"It wasn't all theory. I really liked the fact that it was very clinically based. It was being applied to the patients."

Blinick said that last year, she took part in another research program offered by YU through Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

But she feels SURP provided her with more hands-on, practical experience.

"I felt like I did more this summer. The project I had this year was something the whole lab was already working on. It had already been started and was ongoing when I left," she said.

"I also got to go around with the doctors in the mornings and see patients, so it kind of gave the whole lab experience more of a human aspect."

Following the completion of her BA, Blinick plans to take a year off to work before taking her MCATs and applying to medical school.

Dr. Elyse Lackie Named Chair of JFNY's National Young Leadership Cabinet

Long-Time UJA Federation Volunteer Continues to Inspire the Next Generation

As someone who has personally welcomed more than 4,000 babies into the world, it's safe to say that Dr. Elyse Lackie knows a thing or two about the "next generation."

Lackie, who has practiced Obstetrics and Gynecology at Toronto's North York General Hospital for more than 11 years, was recently named as a chair of The Jewish Federations of North America's (JFNA) National Young Leadership and NYL Cabinet.

Lackie, along with her co-chair, Keith Greenwald of Atlanta, will serve in her new role until June, 2013.

"The impact Cabinet has made across the Jewish world is remarkable," says Dr. Lackie. "We're looking forward to this chance to engage and re-engage some of the greatest leaders of our Jewish community, and to continue to let Cabinet inspire all of us in all the things we do."

Dr. Lackie's involvement with Jewish Federations of North America was a natural progression for her, who, through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, played – and continues to fulfill - a number of vital volunteer roles across the community.

Dr. Lackie, who currently sits on UJA Federation's Board of Directors and its Israel and Overseas Committee, cut her teeth for her newest role as UJA's Impact Toronto co-chair, its own Young Leadership Division.

"I have such a great opportunity to be involved in so many different aspects of UJA's work, that I feel very prepared to take the lead with National Young Leadership with JFNA," said Dr. Lackie. "I've sat on large committees, and small, been part of successful ventures, and not so successful. I've been a leader and also a participant. Probably the most important element of my Toronto experience has been the people I've met and worked with, on the lay and professional side. I have some wonderful mentors and friends thanks to UJA Federation, people I know I can call to get some perspective and wisdom."

"We are delighted that Elyse has been selected to play such a significant role for Jewish Federations across the continent," said UJA Federation of Greater Toronto President & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "UJA Federation of Toronto can be very proud of her leadership and the continuing role Elyse and her fellow generation of emerging leaders from Toronto continue to play for the entire Federation system."

The search for early Israel

The early history of Israel is an elusive thing for historians and archeologists. Many consign it to the realm of myth.

But it should be remembered that myth is not falsehood or untruth. The eminent Harvard University classical scholar, Gregory Nagy, once defined myth for me as "society's way of defining universal truth."

For some, Israel's earliest history is confined to the realm of myth, yet others seek historical evidence of that history. As sentient beings, we have a desire to know about our past. As the so-called "people of the Book," we Jews have an even stronger desire to probe into our origins.

The great American biblical scholar and archeologist, William Foxwell Albright, and his disciples thought that they had found evidence of our early past going as far back as Abraham. In the four decades since Albright's death, that evidence has been eroded.

There was a brief flurry of activity in support of the Albrightian view when a major archive was found at the city of Ebla on the upper Euphrates dating from the latter third to the first half of the second millennium BCE. The first epigrapher of the excavation, Giovanni Pettinato, even claimed that some of the names found in the archive corresponded to those in the book of Genesis.

Leading the charge in support of this interpretation was my friend, the late Prof. David Noel Freedman, who at the time held the A.F. Thurneau Chair in Biblical Studies at the University of Michigan. Unfortunately, closer examination of this material by a number of other epigraphers challenged Pettinato's interpretation of the material and once again consigned Abraham and his ancestors to the mists of prehistory.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

Although we have not had any major discoveries in the area outside of Israel, some surprising new developments have occurred the Holy Land itself.

The initial discovery of an inscription in northern Israel at Tel Dan in the early 1990s began to turn things around. The inscription, ascribed to the Aramaean, King Hazael of Damascus, mentioned the "House of David" for the first time outside of the Bible.

More recently, in 2008, an inscribed pottery shard was found at Tel Qeiyafa, west of Jerusalem, which has been dated by some scholars to either the late 11th or early 10th century BCE. Scholars such as Emile Puech of the Ecole Biblique et Archeologique Francaise in Jerusalem see it as a dispatch marking the accession of Saul as Israel's first king. The document is also seen as having moral overtones, with such concepts as looking out for the orphan and protecting the poor contained within it. Unfortunately, the inscription is physically not in very good shape and open to differing interpretations, with a number of scholars doubting whether it is even written in Hebrew.

However, what is crucial about this document is that it indicates something much more important than the existence of a historical personage. It already shows our commitment to the ideals of morality and universal justice – arguably our greatest gift to the world.

I'm sorry. So sorry.

We are well into the Jewish month of Elul and with Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur around the corner, this is the traditional time for repentance and forgiveness. Repentance to God often takes the form of reciting a set liturgy while striking your chest with your fist (and then acting on your resolve). But what about repentance – and forgiveness – if you have wronged a friend or loved one?

According to Judaism, saying sorry just isn't enough. Rabbi Joseph Telushkin explains, "Jewish tradition holds that tshuvah consists of several stages: the sinner must recognize his sin, feel sincere remorse, undo any damage he has done and pacify the victim of his offence and resolve never to commit the sin again." [http://bit.ly/sorry11]

Jane Ulman brings that down to earth in her article, For Jews, Forgiveness Was Never Meant To Be Easy. To get the point across to her young children, she told them about one of her "memorable childhood transgressions" when as a preteen she "stole several lipsticks and some makeup from the local five-and-dime. When I came home, my mother discovered the stolen goods, eliciting tears and an immediate confession. She drove me back downtown where I asked to see the store manager. Embarrassed, apprehensive and contrite, I returned the items to him, apologized and offered to pay. I have not shoplifted since."

Ulman continues, "How much easier it would be to avoid discussions of wrongs, to not ask forgiveness of people we have injured, to not make our children return to the store where they have stolen something. How much easier it would be to abdicate personal responsibility and to espouse universal forgiveness." [http://bit.ly/sorry12]

But what if we aren't given the opportunity to enter into dialogue with a person we hurt? In that case, Dalia Marx suggests that "we can nonetheless incorporate our feeling of remorse into a new commitment to becoming a person of greater truth and honesty, actively striving to bring blessings to our world. As the Kotzker Rebbe purportedly said: 'There is nothing more complete than a broken heart.' Sometimes our very brokenness can lead us to tikkun (repairing and mending)." [http://bit.ly/sorry13]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Rabbi Neil Tow writes that even if the person we wronged has died, Jewish tradition says our act of asking forgiveness should be a public one. Rabbi Yosi ben Chanina tells us in the Talmud that "we gather a minyan, 10 people, at the grave and recite the formula: I have sinned against Adonai, the God of Israel, and against this person whom I wronged." (Yoma 87a) [http://bit.ly/sorry14]

Now that you are motivated, MyJewishLearning.com offers the following advice (for lovers of acronyms).

- C - Confess without excuse.
- O - Offer an apology that you don't want to do it again.
- N - Note the other person's pain.
- F - Forever value. Explain that you value your relationship and want to restore it.
- E - Equalize. Ask how you can make it up to the person.
- S - Say "never again." Promise that you won't do it again (and mean it).
- S - Seek forgiveness. Ask the other person directly, "Can you forgive me?" [http://bit.ly/sorry16]

Next week: The apology has been delivered. Does Judaism require you to accept it?

Classic Judaism bred modern Jewry

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum

"You shall not see your brother's ass or ox fallen down by the way... you shall surely help him." Classic Judaism plays on the Hebrew word in this verse, imo, which literally means "with him." If your neighbour sits idly by, you are under no obligation to do his work for him. But when he joins in when you offer help, you are obliged to assist.

Classic Jewish thought is rooted in classic Jewish texts and codified in classic Jewish law, or Halachah. These classic halachic approaches are being claimed by some contemporary Jews.

Classic Judaism is not monolithic. In the Middle Ages, Judaism knew homiletic interpretation (Rashi, 1040-1150), rationalist interpretation (Abraham Ibn Ezra, 1089-1164, and Maimonides, 1135-1204), and mystical interpretation (Nachmanides, 1194-1270, and Yosef Caro, 1488-1575). Judaism knew differences among Ashkenazi, Sephardi and other communities. What in each case bound them together was their devotion to Halachah.

Halachic questions cover all aspects of life, not just ritual issues, not just civil issues, not just criminal issues, but moral and ethical issues as well – subjects explicitly not covered by modern secular law. The halachic process "uncovers what the law is found to be."

Scholars have identified classic Judaism as having the following components:

• God. God is the one and singular who created the world, revealed the law, and will redeem the world.

• Chosen people. A view of history centred upon the chosen people of Israel.

• Rapprochement. Passages recalling the sacrifices with the power to sweep one up to the ancient Temple, through which one brings oneself to God and receives expiation.

Rabbinic Reflections

• Learning. The belief in divine revelation and its study as a means to the formation of a noble character, a study that would normally include secular learning as well.

• Living in the world. "Holiness" as not denying the world, but as living in the world successfully and meaningfully contributing to society.

• Ethics. Striving, in God's presence, to conduct one's business affairs between Jew and Jew, and between Jew and non-Jew, faithfully.

• Rhythms. Time imbued with cosmic meaning and sanctity through the daily cycle, weekly cycle, monthly cycle, yearly cycle and life cycle.

• Klal Yisrael. God forges a covenant with the People of Israel, shaping the people as a group, proclaiming its laws, calling the people to holiness, and transforming difference into common destiny.

• Eretz Yisrael. The sanctity of the land, the yearning for Zion, the hope for the restoration of Jerusalem and the Temple cult – all of these are the symbols by which the redemption of the past from Egypt is projected onto the future.

• Redemption. The messianic hope, made concrete in the figure of the Messiah, son of David and king of Israel.

• Purpose. Standing between revelation and redemption, the Jew has purpose: fulfilling God's law, the Halachah, and thus helping to bring about the expected redemption.

Classic Judaism is not a contemporary phenomenon lying somewhere on the scale between Orthodox and Conservative. Classic Judaism is a historical phenomenon that precedes the Orthodox and Conservative denominations. It is the soil out of which the denominations grew. The law is practiced, not just obeyed.

"You shall not see your brother's ass or ox fallen down by the way... you shall surely help him."

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum is president of the Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School.

Redefining ourselves

As the High Holidays grow nearer, it's the perfect time for us to reflect both on ourselves and our relationship with God. Interestingly, in Judaism, it can become difficult to separate these relationships.

On the one hand, we view God as the Divine Creator separate and apart from us. God stands outside time and history and is the Divine Being that we build a relationship with and pray to. God stands outside of us, and it's incumbent on us to find God. All of this language implies a separate Being apart from us in the universe and beyond.

On the other hand, we're taught that God lies within each of us, deep inside. Hardly a Being outside in the world, God in this view is a Being with whom we connect internally. To discover God now becomes a journey of self-discovery.

So which relationship is the correct one? As with most things in Judaism, there's never one answer or one correct path. Ultimately the goal is to have one approach lead to the other. A journey outward would bring about moments of self-discovery and personal limitation, while a journey inward

Midrashic Moments

would bring about a new appreciation for the context of the world.

Each of these approaches situates God as an integral part of our identities and how we place ourselves within the world. Sometimes it's our love of God that allows us to be respectful and polite to our neighbour, to remember that even they have God within them, and to disrespect them is, in fact, to disrespect God. Sometimes it's our commitment to God that allows us to prepare for a Jewish holiday even when we're exhausted from the last one. Sometimes it's our trust in God that allows us to bear the trials of life when we feel that we just can't take any more.

The outcome of all of this is that we become nicer people who have stretched the limitations of our abilities and our endurance. Our relationship with God, in other words, redefines us. Who we are and who we will become is directly connected to where we situate God in our lives.

The Sages in the Talmud understood that how we define God will ultimately result in how we are defined. They stated that God had said, "You have declared Me a unique entity, and I shall declare you a unique entity."

CIJA calls for boycott of United Church

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is calling on the Canadian Jewish community to make a wholesale break from the United Church of Canada.

On the heels of the church's Aug. 18 General Council decision to adopt a boycott of products made in Israeli settlements, the centre sent a letter to community leaders and institutions asking them to cut ties in every regard.

The letter, dated Aug. 23 and sent by CIJA co-chair David Koschitzky, asks the community to consider imposing an "immediate moratorium on all dialogue and partnership activities between the institutions of the Canadian Jewish community and the United Church of Canada, its regional conferences, local presbyteries and individual congregations.

"This moratorium specifically includes bilateral discussions involving the United Church and Jewish communal institutions, broad interfaith groups in which the church is one of several partners, and educational activities. We ask the rabbinic and lay leadership of the Canadian Jewish community to respect the highest degree of solidarity with this moratorium."

As of the paper's deadline, it was unclear how many people and institutions in the Jewish community had received the letter. However, CIJA said it initially sent the message to more than 500 people on its email distribution list and expected that it would be further disseminated to numerous "local agencies, synagogues and partners" across the country.

David Koschitzky

CIJA said it will consult with lay leaders and rabbis nationwide over the next month to figure out the best way forward with the church and to see how and whether to keep lines of communication open with individual church members and ministers who tried to block the boycott resolution adopted at the 41st General Council earlier this month.

"We recognize and thank the many friends within the [church] who worked to defeat the General Council resolutions on Israel-Palestine and who spoke out against a boycott of Israeli goods."

The centre will have its annual board of directors meeting on Sept. 20, and it will discuss the results of its meetings with the Jewish community on this subject, Koschitzky said.

CIJA said it would also soon embark on a national campaign to counter the church's boycott stance by encouraging Canadians – and church members sympathetic to the centre's cause – to buy goods made in Israel and the West Bank.

Thornhill teacher writes children's book

Michelle Bitran
Intern

For teacher and librarian Marilyn Wagman, achieving your goals begins with a dream. This past June, the 54-year-old teacher and librarian at Thornhill Woods Public School self-published a picture book that she has been diligently working on for the last three years.

"At Thornhill Woods, the motto of our school is dream it, believe it, achieve it," Wagman said, adding that writing her own children's book has been a dream of hers for years. "We tell [our students] to persevere with things that are difficult, and I did."

Wagman's book, Petunia Peachim's Predicament, tells the story of a school librarian, who bears a striking resemblance to Wagman herself, with a fear of lending out her cherished books.

Realizing that they cannot take out their favourite books, Petunia's students slowly stop coming to the library. One day, a young boy named Percival helps Petunia deal with her fears of lost or ruined books and convinces her to begin lending them out.

In the "About the Author" section, Wagman writes, "Marilyn wants to make it abundantly clear that she does indeed let students take out treasured books from her library. However, she does readily admit that it is not always easy for her to part with them."

For anyone who has met Wagman or seen her library at school, this admission will bring a smile to their face. Wagman's love of literature, and children's literature in particular, shines through in her enthusiasm as she talks about books. Her library is brightly decorated with whimsical butterflies, colourful rugs and comfy nooks for students to curl up with a good book.

For her, writing her own children's book was a natural extension of her 30-year teaching career and her work as a librarian and a literacy coach.

"Through my experience of working with kids, I know what they like," Wagman said. She brought rough drafts of Petunia Peachim's Predicament to school, reading it to students from grades 1 through 8, and getting feedback on how to improve the story.

"I said to them, 'I really want your input,'" she said. "I was very committed to make this story a professional story and a publishable story."

Family sues Winnipeg Jewish nursing home

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The question of patient care at the Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre (also known as the Sharon Home), Winnipeg's largely Jewish nursing home, is back in the spotlight.

Lilian Peck is a former resident of the home who died from an infection caused by untreated bedsores. On Aug. 13, her family filed a lawsuit against the seniors residence and seven nurses employed there – or formerly employed there – for negligence in Peck's death.

Marsha Palansky of Winnipeg, her sister, Jacquelyn Roger of Toronto, and their children, Michelle, Jason and Shira Palansky and Russell and Sarah Roger, filed the lawsuit for negligence in the death of Peck, their mother and grandmother.

The family is seeking $70,000 for "loss of guidance, care and companionship," as well as $7,865.91 to cover the cost of burial.

Peck's family has also approached police through lawyer Harvey Berkal to bring criminal charges in the case. (Berkal's father, the late Rabbi Louis Berkal, was also a resident of the Simkin Centre in his last months and received what some members of the family consider subpar care.)

The Peck case goes back to the fall of 2010 when Peck, 93, was transferred from the home to a hospital and it was discovered that she was suffering from severe, untreated bedsores.

In the statement of claim, the family asserts that the nursing staff at the home was aware as early as Oct. 2, 2010, that peck was "at high risk for pressure ulcers." A nurse first noticed one such ulcer on Oct. 9. The on-call physician examined the patient and recommended treatment. The wound was cleaned and an ointment applied, and there was no further followup.

Five days later, when Peck complained about pain in the area of her groin, she was told, "Lay down and go to sleep." The nurses on duty didn't examine her until much later in the evening, when a health-care aide reported his concerns to the night-shift nurse. Two days later, she was found to be unresponsive and was transferred to hospital, where numerous infected sores were detected. She died shortly after.

In the aftermath of Peck's passing, under pressure from her family and several other families, the provincial government's Protection of Persons in Care Office (PPCO) and the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA) conducted reviews of the Simkin Centre. A number of recommendations were brought forth aimed at improving care. As well, the centre's CEO at the time, Sandra Delorme, took sick leave and was replaced last spring by Kathleen Klaasen.

To fight the case, Peck's family has hired as co-counsels, Elliott Leven and Martin Pollock. "This case isn't about money," said Pollock, a specialist in malpractice cases. "There is no loss of income or future earnings involved.

Miracle child celebrates bar mitzvah

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — David Bregman's survival after being born prematurely at 25 weeks weighing just 740 grams (1.63 pounds) was received as a miracle by his parents.

He spent more than three months in neonatal intensive care at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), and left for home weighing 2.35 kilos (a little over five pounds).

David became the poster child for the JGH's $50-million capital campaign, pictured asleep contentedly in the arms of a nurse.

That was 15 years ago. There have been many challenges for David and his parents, Orit Jacobovitz and Howard Bregman, in that time.

He has had health and other physical concerns to deal with, and was diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome.

He attended United Talmud Torahs' Shorashim program for children with mild developmental delays, and is now at Summit School for youngsters with special needs.

This month, at 15, David celebrated his bar mitzvah, a rite of passage his parents thought he would never achieve. They were given little encouragement that it was possible.

The rabbis his parents approached gave them "the runaround" when they asked about his having a bar mitzvah at their synagogue, or just never called back.

"David did not fit into a perfect box," Orit said. "They saw him as a square peg trying to fit in a round hole."

Discouraged, David himself did not want to pursue it. Judaism did not hold much interest for him.

That was until the family was put in touch with Rabbi Moshe Krasnanski, director of Chabad of the Town, by the parents of another child with special needs.

"Rabbi Krasnanski immediately welcomed us with open arms, and said he would do all that he could to make this happen," Orit said.

One week after the ceremony, David was "still on cloud nine. He says, 'I'm a super star,'" she added.

David clicked right away with the centre's Rabbi Zalmy Rader, who tutored him over several months. With Rabbi Rader's patience and kindness, David blossomed and looked forward to his Sunday morning lessons. He actually found them fun and interesting.

"If you show a child love, he will respond," Rabbi Rader said. "He needed someone to believe in him."

His mother noticed how her son matured over those months.

David's father said his son now "realizes he can overcome everything, if he puts his mind to it."

When David went up to the bimah on a Monday morning at the Jean Talon Street centre, he read confidently from the Torah, while his father and Rabbi Rader stood beside him. One of David's physical challenges has affected his speech, but the Hebrew words flowed from him that day.

In his speech afterward, David remembered his twin, Gregory, "who should be standing beside me today." Gregory died when he was 16 days old.

In evident good spirits, David continued, "I know that I am a bit overdue, but as my mom always says, 'Better late than never…' Mom, you can stop nagging me now. I finally do understand the importance of being bar mitzvahed and the keeping of our Jewish traditions."

Now that he is a man, he continued humorously, David said he expects to be making his own rules and decisions from now on.

He thanked Rabbi Krasnanski for giving him this opportunity, and said he looked forward to continuing to make his parents proud.

David turned to his sole sibling, 11-year-old brother Shayne, thanking him for "coming to my rescue in times of need."

Rabbi Krasnanski noted that David's parshah was particularly appropriate. In the passage, God reminds the Jewish People that life is a gift and that each day is an opportunity not to be squandered.

David, he said has grasped that truth, and turned his life into a blessing.

Shlichim say goodbye to Saskatoon

Brian Moskowitz
Special to The CJN

SASKATOON, Sask. — As a young idealistic couple, Ayelet Shiryon and Ido Weissler left their home in Israel and volunteered to work in one of Canada's smallest Jewish communities.

They had few expectations and even fewer fantasies about how warm a community located in one of the coldest areas of the country could be.

Two years later, as they ended their stay earlier this month and prepared to leave, the shlichim (emissaries) of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Areivim program in Saskatoon, the couple, along with their new infant daughter, Ora, had gained dozens of new family members at Congregation Agudas Israel, and a lifetime of heartwarming memories.

"We're really going to miss the people, but especially the intensity of community life," said Weissler, 30, a trained actor from Jerusalem who met Shiryon while both were camp counsellors for the North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY) summer camp program in Israel.

"I think we've had this protective bubble around us that surrounded us with love, and I don't think we can compare it to anything," said Shiryon, 29.

She added that the community provided her husband with a very expansive stage, both when he delivered divrei torah at Shabbat services and during the many events they developed for community members of all ages.

The Areivim program of Saskatoon is the only one of its kind in North America where the community, and not the Jewish Agency or the local Jewish federation, financially supports its shlichim, Shiryon said of the program, which started in Saskatoon in September 2000.

"I think it's a brave decision for the community to do that, and to choose to bring us into their lives," she said. "We only have to say goodbye once, but this community has to say goodbye, to each and every couple and it's not something anyone here takes for granted."

Saskatoon has an estimated 140 Jewish families, of whom about 100 are members of the shul. The city of about 180,000 also has a Chabad Centre and a small egalitarian Conservative congregation that meets in a local community centre.

Shiryon and Weissler were the ninth couple to participate in the Areivim program at the 104-year-old Congregation Agudas Israel, which is affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. The program, which matches young couples with Jewish communities across North America, is named after the talmudic maxim that "all Jews are responsible for one another – Kol Yisrael areivim zeh bazeh."

Ayelet Shiryon and Ido Weissler with daughter, Ora

The couple was originally scheduled to volunteer for one year, but they returned for a second to nurture growing connections between young professionals who met regularly at the young adults program developed by the couple.

"The group is the future of the community, and we wanted the group to feel comfortable with each other as a way of opening up other possibilities for co-operation in the community," Shiryon said.

"Ido and Ayelet worked in every aspect of our community, and it would take an essay to do justice to all they did," said Marsha Scharfstein, principal of the Agudas Israel Congregation Hebrew School since 2005 and a member of the synagogue since 1981.

Whether as mentors arranging speakers for Israel on Campus and for the Hillel at the University of Saskatchewan, teaching at the Hebrew school or leading the "Holy Pan" kosher cooking class, Shiryon and Weissler's enthusiasm and sense of fun and adventure made their presence appreciated by everyone they came into contact with, Scharfstein said.

"Ido is an actor, so some of the holidays, like Chanukah and Purim, were taught by having the children act out a play which made the learning process both very fun and educational," she said. "Children remember more when they do something active, rather than by just listening passively."

Shiryon said the average workday lasted 24 hours, and that the process of reinforcing and building connections between community members and between the Jewish community and the people of Saskatoon fostered a deeper connection with her husband and the type of family life they are building.

"Through this process of community involvement, Ido became my best friend, my best girlfriend, my best colleague, so the idea of areivut, of mutual responsibility, extends not only to the Saskatoon Jewish community, but to each other as well," she said.

The Iranian threat is a real one

It's not bluster. Nor is it just "psychological warfare." All the warnings in Israel that the Jewish state can't afford to sit still while Iran races to acquire nuclear weapons must be taken seriously.

The number of recent articles speculating about what Israel may do to counter this looming threat is staggering.

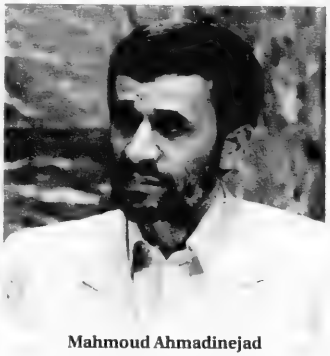
In the meantime, the Iranian leadership's familiar anti-Israel and antisemitic rants have accelerated in a particularly noxious manner.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told a crowd of worshippers on Aug. 17 that "the existence of the Zionist regime is an insult to all humanity." Two days later, marking the end of Ramadan, Iran's Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei called Israel a "cancerous tumour at the heart of the Islamic world" that must be destroyed. Gen. Amir Ali Hajizadeh, a commander in Iran's Revolution Guards Corps, declared that Israel would be "wiped out of the map and thrown into the trash bin of history forever."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Israel's UN mission called on the Security Council "and all responsible members of the international community to condemn Iranian hate speech without any further delay." The United States did, while UN secretary Ban Ki-moon issued a statement calling the Iran's tirades merely "offensive and inflammatory." He asked Iran to tone it down, reminding its leaders that according to the UN Charter, it's forbidden for one member state to call for the destruction of another. But no moves are afoot to expel Iran from the UN for repeatedly violating this pledge (or to hold it to account for its incitement to genocide – something Liberal MP Irwin Cotler drew attention to in the Aug. 14 National Post). At the same time, Ban indicated, in the face of Israeli objections, that he planned to attend an upcoming meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement in Tehran. So much for isolating Iran internationally.



Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Discussions about whether Iranian leaders, transfixed by Holocaust denial and other antisemitic delusions, are "rational" or "irrational" are beside the point. As George Jonas put it in the National Post: "A fellow who says he's out to destroy you is out to destroy you. Believe him." If Jews have learned anything from their great but tragic history, it is this.

In this toxic climate, a public debate has grown in Israel about how best (or how in the least bad way) to respond to the Iranian threat. There are no good options. It's clear that sanctions and diplomacy aren't working. Not only are these measures not stopping Iran from pursuing its illicit nuclear program, they're not even slowing it down. Israel never thought they would. Nonetheless, others in the international community are urging Israel to give them more time, while Israel argues that this allows Iran more time to develop and hide its nuclear assets, shielding them from attack.

Here's where the debate in Israel stands: It's intolerable to live under the threat of a nuclear strike by Iran. On the other hand, if Israel launches a preventive attack on Iran's nuclear facilities, the experts agree that Israel alone won't be able to destroy them. It will only be able to set back the Iranian nuclear program by a year or two, but will also likely incur Iranian, and Hezbollah, counterstrikes. Can Israel afford to act alone? Can it count on the United States, whose president has promised, more than once, that he won't allow Iran to acquire nuclear weapons?

Absent an agreement with the Americans, a plurality of Israelis, including military and strategic experts, don't want Israel to act alone at this time.

In the Aug. 22 Globe and Mail, Paul Koring noted that "despite the sabre-rattling, few analysts expect an imminent Israeli strike." Writing in Foreign Policy magazine, former U.S. Mideast peace negotiator Aaron David Miller concurred, saying that an Israeli strike is unlikely before the American presidential election in November. Still, he concluded, "If you're betting on a war with Iran, think year's end or early next... Ultimately, Israel will act."

'Our vulnerable seniors deserve to be treated with dignity and respect'

"The point is that our vulnerable seniors deserve to be treated with dignity and respect. They deserve to receive proper health care. That is in keeping with our Jewish traditions.

"Unfortunately, in this case, the treatment that Mrs. Peck received allegedly fell beneath the threshold of what would be an acceptable level of care," Pollock continued.

"The family wants to make sure that the kind of negligence that happened to their mother and grandmother doesn't happen to anyone else anywhere else, no matter whether a Jewish or non-Jewish nursing home."

Despite the reviews and recommendations for improvement, Berkal said that he is still being made aware of deficiencies in care at the Simkin Centre. He believes that having a nurse practitioner (a nurse who is licensed to carry out many of the functions of a physician short of prescribing medication) on staff would make a difference.

The WRHA has promised that the Simkin Centre is the next institution in line for a nurse practitioner," he said, "and the new CEO [Klaasen] is very much in favour of nurse practitioners."

Regarding the family's statement of claim, Klaasen wrote, "We have just recently received it and have not yet had time to review it. As a result, we cannot comment further at this point.

"Regarding your comments about a specific resident situation, I'm sure you understand that the Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre must respect the confidentiality of residents and so are prohibited by legislation (Manitoba Personal Health Information Act) from releasing information regarding specific cases without the consent of the resident or next of kin (when appropriate). This can be particularly delicate if a case involves people whose ability to provide consent may be impaired by illness.

"It is important to note that the Protection for Persons in Care Office receives numerous calls and concerns about personal-care homes, which they review to determine whether or not they warrant an investigation. This past year, there has been only one investigation by the PPCO involving the Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre, which was ruled to be unfounded."

She added that "the introduction of nurse practitioners in personal-care homes is a good model with demonstrated positive resident outcomes. However, at this time, our priority and focus is to implement the quality-improvement initiatives outlined in our Action Plan, which was developed in conjunction with all our stakeholders."

Annual campaign funds programs

"People do give money for capital projects. It's part of their philanthropy, their strategy," he explained. "The same people who have their names on these buildings are mega-givers to the annual campaign.

"In terms of a lifetime of giving, it's much higher than what their capital gifts are. If I knew that every year, I could get $110 million from the same donors, I would say, 'Sure, lets have free [day school] tuition for all.'"

He offers this analogy: "Tuition for 11,000 students is $120 million. That's the cost of [the Schwartz/Reisman Centre]. [If it were allocated to tuition,] it would be gone in one year.

"You need buildings," he said. "We have to stack up against the general community and give people a sense of pride in the community."

Springer said the buildings are designed for revenue generation, and Sokolsky said they will "carry themselves" financially.

Shulman noted that it's the annual campaign that funds programs in the new buildings.

Springer said doing the budget is a three-month process.

"It's about active, divergent communities with a lot of needs and looking at our budget line by line by line."

Book explores mild cognitive impairment

Living with Mild Cognitive Impairment
A Guide to Maximizing Brain Health and Reducing Risk of Dementia
Nicole D. Anderson, PhD · Kelly J. Murphy, PhD
Angela K. Troyer, PhD

Three Baycrest psychologists have written one of the first books on mild cognitive impairment (MCI) aimed at patients and families.

Nicole Anderson, Kelly Murphy and Angela Troyer spent about 1-1/2 years working on Living with Mild Cognitive Impairment: A Guide to Maximizing Brain Health and Reducing Risk of Dementia, published by Oxford University Press.

MCI is considered a transition stage or border between mild cognitive changes associated with normal aging and more serious cognitive problems caused by an underlying disease process such as Alzheimer's.

The authors say that 10 to 15 per cent of people with MCI will progress to dementia within the first year of being diagnosed with the condition, and about 80 per cent will develop dementia within six years.

"The silver lining [though] is that research is starting to identify lifestyle modifications that can improve functioning and slow progression to dementia, and not all people with MCI will get worse," they wrote.

Troyer, who has been at Baycrest for 16 years, said the book came about because over the years patients have asked for recommendations and there were no books on the market. "There were books on Alzheimer's and there was [research aimed at health professionals], but there was a real gap."

Written primarily with patients in mind, the book is also aimed at family members and people who take care of them. It is divided into three sections: what is MCI; how it is identified, and what can be done to improve prognosis.

It begins with a case study about a man living with MCI who does not fully understand his diagnosis and is frustrated by his symptoms. By the end, he is equipped with tools to live with MCI.

Each case study presented in the book is made up of an amalgamation of patients, said Troyer.

MCI can be scary, she said, because there are so many unknowns. "There is nothing to predict what will happen. It can progress to Alzheimer's, but it can also remain stable or go away. Some things do increase a person's risk, but no one knows."

People often worry about what is normal memory loss and what is MCI, she said.

"That is the million-dollar question. It is hard to know what is normal unless the patient is assessed, but there are red flags.

"It is totally normal to forget a name or where you put something, but if you forget the name of a loved one, or people tell you that you are forgetting or repeating things, you should see your family doctor. By definition, patients have progressed to dementia when they are no longer able to manage daily acts."

She said that certain lifestyle changes, which are good for all brains, don't cure anyone, but the positive changes could keep a brain functioning at its maximum for as long as possible.

"Maintain a healthy diet, exercise your brain, keep active and stay social. There are also practical memory strategies that can help someone with MCI," said Troyer.

From the very first moment you meet Kitty Cohen, you can't believe this vibrant little woman is about to turn 100. But that's exactly what she will do later this year – she will celebrate her 100th birthday in December.

When you ask Kitty what her secret is, she replies with a twinkle in her eye and a great big smile, "It's all in our state of mind, our mind says it and we do it."

Kitty believes we are meant to move every muscle in our body from our eyes to our toes daily if we want to remain agile. Every morning, she gets up, takes the stairs three flights down and goes for a 40-minute walk outside before she has her tea. Then she makes her way over to Temple Sinai for morning services before she starts her day.

When you ask Kitty why she walks every day, another smile lights up her face as she recites a little poem she made up that goes something like this: "Why do I walk, ain't no mystery, I want a good physical history. Doctor told me walking is great, it helps them blood cells circulate. Great for the lungs, great for the ticker, can't nothing get ya in better shape quicker."

Then she giggles, a contagious little giggle, and you can't help but giggle too.

Don't let her size fool you. She still has a busy schedule of weekly exercise classes that include yoga, as well as tap, folk, square and line dancing, which she still gets to by bus.

Kitty has been walking in the Weekend to End Women's Cancers since 2008 and is doing so again next month. She is their oldest participant, and this year, the Weekend to End Woman's Cancers decided to celebrate Kitty's upcoming 100th birthday along with their 10th anniversary. She hopes to raise at least $3,000 and is aiming to walk about 10 to 15 kilometres each day of the two-day event.

So go on, get up and move something. If Kitty Cohen can do it, so can you.

Bedouin issue remains a priority in Israel

Joel Shupac

One of the existential issues that the State of Israel now faces is the resolution of Bedouin land claims and economic development in the approximately 60 per cent of the state comprised by the country's Negev region.

The Bedouin issue has been pushed to the back burner by the controversies over national service by haredim and Israeli Arabs and the proposed legalization of West Bank settlements, but the resolution of the land title and development issues in the Negev will have an immense bearing on the economic and demographic development of the state.

The Arab Bedouin who have inhabited the large desert area in the south of Israel as nomads for centuries are at the centre of the conflict, which pits the desire of the Bedouin to preserve their culture against the state's determination to use the land and its resources for productive purposes and to foster Jewish settlement in the region.

Historically, allocation of land among Bedouin tribes was by oral and customary arrangement, which the Bedouin regarded as binding, a position not accepted by the Israeli courts but, problematically for the state, finding increasing acceptance as "indigenous rights" by international bodies such as the United Nations and Economic Union. Indeed, UN agencies such as UNESCO and the Council on Human Rights, farcical as the latter arguably is with its membership composed in part of brutal dictatorships, are already seized of the issue and producing reports depicting Israel as a despoiler of indigenous rights.

The British Mandatory authorities encouraged the registration of land claims in 1921, but the Bedouin declined to do so, following their practice under the Ottoman regime, although some voluntary payments were made to the mandatory authorities, arguably to provide a quasi-legal basis to their land claims. These were not accepted by the Israeli courts as the basis of legal title.

Acting pursuant to the regime of military law that governed the predominantly Arab-inhabited areas of the state prior to 1966, Israel's policy was to concentrate the Bedouin population, consisting of about 11,000 in 1948, in the northeast quadrant, the so-called "siyag" or "enclosure." The area was defined by the locations of the future cities of Be'er Sheva, Rahat, Arad and Dimona, in order to facilitate the provision of services to the Bedouin, wean them from their nomadic existence, and in the view of the Bedouin, to make land available for Jewish settlement.

The new, relatively impermeable borders of Israel made nomadic existence impractical. The Bedouin spontaneously created "unrecognized" villages, a term coined by Israeli officials. There are now about 38 such settlements, where about 71,000 Bedouin live, nearly 40 per cent of the 191,000 Bedouin in the Negev. The settlements, which constitute 2.7 per cent of the land area of the Negev, lack infrastructure and municipal services. They are not connected to the national water and sewage systems or the electrical grid. Rates of unemployment and crime are high.

As the Bedouin population expanded, their existence was marked by a set of unique problems arising from features of Bedouin society such as nomadism, clan divisions and polygamy. Despite progress in areas such as education and health care, their condition continues to deteriorate because of rapid population growth, coupled with a host of social and economic problems that make them the poorest population group in the state.

The settlement patterns feature clans living together, physically separated from other clans, and in cohabitation of extended families. As one might expect from a population that was nomadic within living memory, flocks of sheep must be readily available for sustenance. Such patterns are hard to reconcile with the modern town planning principles of a western state, where residential units are not expected to grow exponentially to accommodate extended family growth.

As well, the lack of organized transportation services in the unrecognized villages has contributed to their economic isolation, inability of residents to work in the cities and low female participation in the work force.

Attempts by the state to address the problems of the Bedouin in the Negev have run afoul of a dilemma that appears existential: the Bedouin define themselves in relation to the land, yet it appears that their integration into Israeli society can only be achieved by becoming productive citizens in a modern economy.

The government has struggled to resolve the clash of rights and goals by appointing a judicial inquiry chaired by retired Supreme Court Justice Eliezer Goldberg, and subsequently by appointing a committee headed by Ehud Prawer, head of the policy planning committee in the Prime Minister's Office, to advise on implementation of the Goldberg Commission report.

Goldberg recommended that the government extend legal recognition to most unrecognized villages, that others be moved to alternate sites, that some Bedouin complainants be compensated monetarily and others with land. Its report, submitted in 2008, was written in conciliatory and positive language, and proposed giving the Bedouin the "right to ownership" of land, in consideration of their "historic connection" to it.

By way of contrast, the controversial highlight of Prawer's recommendations, which were approved by the cabinet in 2011, is to move nearly 30,000 Bedouin residents of unrecognized villages to expanded areas of existing Bedouin towns such as Rahat, Kseifa and Hura.

Bedouin who live or work on land over which they claim ownership are to receive replacement land of half the area they claim, and monetary compensation for the balance.

Minister Binyamin Begin has been tasked with consulting interested parties regarding the implementation of the Prawer recommendations, and to recommend amendments where necessary. A five-year implementation period is contemplated, with the amount of compensation to be reduced over the course of that period as an incentive to settle all outstanding legal claims. At the conclusion of the five-year period, land that has not been the subject of the claims process will be registered as state land.

Bedouin representatives and human-rights organizations have complained that the Prawer report diverges from Goldberg in that the latter made a greater effort to legalize Bedouin settlements where possible, and had no relocation component. They also took exception to the fact that Prawer appeared to drop Goldberg's finding that historically the Bedouin had been wronged and that the injustice needed to be ended.

Bedouin villages that fall within the master plan for the Be'er Sheva area, which have access to public infrastructure, would become recognized communities. The Prime Minister's Office has not foreclosed the possibility that new Bedouin towns would be established within lands currently inhabited by Bedouin tribes.

Prawer proposed criteria for recognizing Bedouin villages, including meeting minimal levels of population density, contiguity and economic sustainability. The Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) criticizes these criteria as flouting principles of equality and justice in the distribution of resources. "If the same criteria were applied to the Jewish population, whole settlements – including community settlements… kibbutzim and moshavim – would be doomed," according to the association.

The final settlement of all land claims and title issues is regarded as the precondition to further economic development of the Negev, much as it is in Canada with respect to aboriginal land claims. It is only on the basis of legally recognized title that development of resources such as solar energy or ecologically sustainable agriculture with Bedouin participation could proceed.

The plan also provides for a 1.2-billion-shekel (Cdn $307-million) scheme for economic development of the Bedouin population, intended to significantly reduce the economic and social gaps between the Bedouin and Israeli society as a whole. This represents a substantial increase in the amount proposed by Goldberg, and points to the Likud-led Government's intention to move decisively in the direction of creating social peace and prosperity by improving the life of the Bedouin.

Images of bulldozed villages, a necessary corollary of coerced relocation – especially when taken out of context of the larger scheme – would be extremely damaging to the state when widely broadcast around the world.

The Bedouin are the poorest of Israel's population groups. They have, moreover, shown a marked loyalty to the state, going back to its beginnings. The high enlistment rate in the IDF by Bedouin youth has recently declined, perhaps as a result of the argument over the future of the Negev. Islamic groups, particularly from the north of Israel, have made efforts to disseminate an anti-Israel ideology among the Bedouin.

Substantial improvement in Bedouin living standards would benefit them and the state. It appears that economic development of Israel's Bedouin and the Negev will hinge on the final settlement of legal claims. It is only by entering into a social contract with the Bedouin of the Negev, rather than by imposing a solution, however generous, that peaceful economic development, including increased Jewish settlement in the area, can proceed without a descent into civil strife.

The broad outlines of such a grand bargain would appear to require legal certainty and the abandonment of land claims on one hand, and a large social investment in the Bedouin population on the other. Although the problems are urgent, much work in the area of negotiation remains to be done.

Some Bedouins feel obligation to serve Israel

Ben Sales
JTA

RAHAT, Israel — On an August weekday afternoon, 19-year-old Mohammed Kernowi stands in front of a small store in Israel's largest Bedouin city, a hot plate in front of him with small pancakes sizzling in preparation for the end of that day's Ramadan fast.

At his age, many Israeli men have been through basic training and are weathering their first of three years of compulsory military service either on the country's borders, in the West Bank, in an office or on one of the country's many bases.

An archival photo of then-prime minister Ariel Sharon paying a visit to Rahat

Kernowi, however, prefers baking to bullets.

"No one goes from our family," he said. "It's a waste of three years of your life."

While some Bedouins continue to voluntarily serve in Israel's military, their community – just as with some in Israel's Jewish community – debate whether it is worthwhile. Bedouins, separated physically and to some extent culturally from other Israeli Arabs, are exempt from serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

There are about 250,000 Bedouins in the country, according to Israeli government figures. The IDF could not provide an estimate of the army's current Bedouin population, but Doron Almog, head of Israel's Bedouin Improvement Program Staff, estimates that half a percentage of eligible Bedouins head to the army.

Army service has been a defining part of Israeli public life; many Jewish Israelis make professional connections they use throughout their civilian careers. But the debate about who should serve in the IDF has become especially heated this summer.

This month, the Israeli army officially began drafting young haredi Orthodox men when no new compromise legislation was passed by lawmakers about their service. In February, the Israeli Supreme Court had struck down the law that exempted the haredim from serving and mandated that they serve in either the military or civilian volunteer organizations.

A faction of the Israeli Knesset is demanding that Arabs be required to serve as well. A month ago, the leader of Israel's nationalist Yisrael Beiteinu party, Avigdor Lieberman, submitted a bill to the Knesset that would have required all Israelis, regardless of background, to be drafted. The bill was voted down, and Lieberman incurred protests from Israeli-Arab leaders.

Kernowi complains that Negev Bedouins receive "no equality, no respect" from Jewish Israelis – a claim that is echoed by other Bedouins who also lament lacklustre education and employment programs in Rahat.

Despite the complaints, some Bedouins serve readily and with distinction. Several sound no different than the most patriotic Jewish Israelis in describing the obligation they feel to serve the country, no matter how Israel treats their communities.

"We live in the state and we should give to it," said Sammy, 35, who joined the army [legally] at age 16-1/2. "I wanted to give the state three years."

But Sammy, who works in a Rahat grocery store, also says he regrets his time in the IDF.

"I don't see any value," he said. "It didn't help my life. It would be better if there were equality. There's no equality even between Jews."

On one complaint – the lack of education – Col. Ahmed Ramiz, the head of the IDF's minority department and himself a Bedouin, says army service can help. He says the IDF provides Bedouin soldiers the opportunity to advance their careers, in part by offering trade courses to soldiers along with scholarships.

While Sammy says his IDF's opportunities passed him by, another resident of Rahat, Ibrahim Abuzayid, believes the IDF is the Bedouins' best shot at equality in Israeli society – though he also is frustrated with what he sees as government anti-Bedouin discrimination. As the head of the Bedouin branch of the Coalition for the Soldier, an Israeli aid organization, Abuzayid helps provide troops with supplies and care packages.

"In the army, there's true equality that we don't find in every day," said Abuzayid, who fought in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. "As soon as you take off your uniform, you're nothing. Give me an agricultural plot, a dozen acres. Give me water. I don't deserve it?"

Still, as is the case for many Bedouins, Abuzayid feels a duty to serve that he has passed on to his eight sons, all of whom did army service.

"We don't have another state," he said. "They don't help the Bedouins? It's still our state. We were born here. Our children were born here. There's no reason not to serve."

Syria 2012

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

Horrified, Judy Feld Carr closely follows the news coming out of Syria, where government troops and rebels are waging a bloody civil war. The former music teacher from Toronto has never been to Syria, yet she has a special connection to the country, and especially to the Jewish community that used to live there.

For nearly three decades, Feld Carr single-handedly arranged the smuggling of more than 3,000 Jews out of Damascus, Aleppo and Qamishli to safety in Israel and North America. At the time, the totalitarian Syrian regime didn't allow Jews to emigrate and tortured those caught trying to escape. But lower officials, she found out, could be bribed into letting Jews leave.

"Oh, my dear," she said when asked what's going through her head when she hears the reports from the war zone. "Thank God the Jewish community is out. That's my first thought. Because if you had a sizable community of 3,000 people, this would be a major problem."

Feld Carr, who lives in Toronto and has an apartment in Jerusalem, said both sides in the current war – the troops of President Bashar Assad and the anti-government forces – are committing acts of sheer brutality.

"It's beyond barbaric. There's nothing to describe it," she said. "There's no meaning to each other's life. And that really scares me. Because if they do it to each other, what would they do to foreign countries, their neighbouring countries?"

While the civil war, which started in March 2011, has reportedly already claimed more than 20,000 lives, Feld Carr is especially disgusted by reports of gratuitous savagery – such as when rebels cut off a Syrian soldier's head with a knife – because, she said, she knows pretty well the kind of cruelty Syrian troops are capable of.

"I can't even fathom such barbarism — although in the years that I was doing this rescue, what they did to Jewish prisoners was beyond everything I could have ever believed," she told The Times of Israel recently. "I don't think the Jews would be alive today if that community of over 3,000 was still there. I can tell you that."

In the 1970s, when Feld Carr started her covert escape operation, some 4,600 Jews still lived in Syria, she said. By bribing Syrian officials, including senior members of the country's intelligence community, she was able to arrange to smuggle out exactly 3,228 Jews, "one at a time."

The unlikely saga of a protracted, covert rescue operation led by an Ashkenazi musicologist who grew up in Sudbury in northern Ontario, began when she and her late husband first learned about the plight of Syrian Jewry. The issue wasn't very much in vogue in the early to mid-1970s, as most Jewish activists were focused on demanding freedom for their brethren in the Soviet Union.

After initial phone calls to a synagogue in Damascus, she and her late husband started sending packages with religious items to the local Jewish communities. After awhile, she started communicating via these packages, hiding coded messages in them.

In 1975, an Aleppo-born Jew living in Toronto went to visit her brother, who was still living in Aleppo. She was imprisoned there, but made it out and returned to Canada.

"She brought me, tucked into her underwear, a letter," Feld Carr recalls. "It's a letter that you only see during the times of the Holocaust. It was a letter written by three rabbis in Aleppo, saying something to the effect of: 'Our children are your children. Get us out of here!'"

Two years later, Feld Carr managed to smuggle the first person out of Syria.

"It was a straight ransom, but it took me ages to do it."

At the time, Canada didn't have an embassy in Damascus, and it was quite an ordeal to bribe the officials to get the refugee the papers he needed to exit the country and board a plane to Toronto, she recalls.

"In those days, I didn't know what I was doing. If you had told me I would be doing a rescue mission, I'd have said you're totally mad. I mean, I'm a musicologist, not a rescuer."

The Syrian Jew arrived in Canada in terrible shape. Because his children had been caught trying to flee, he spent some time in a Syrian prison, where he was badly beaten. On top of that, he was suffering from terminal cancer.

"After we brought him to Mt. Sinai Hospital, he said to me: 'Judy, I have one thing to ask you: I want to go to Israel. I want to have a cup of coffee with my mother, who's 97 years old. Then I can die in Israel.'" Feld Carr remembered.

The man was taken to Israel and had coffee with his mother – although she had Alzheimer's and didn't recognize him.

"Then I saw him in Israel the day before he died, at his daughter's house," Feld Carr recalled. "He said to me: 'I have one more thing to ask you. I want you to take out the oldest of my single daughters.'

"Remember: I don't know yet what I'm really doing. I thought to myself, what do I say to a man who's dying? So I said, 'Yes, I will take her out."

Feld Carr succeeded in smuggling the 19-year-old out of the country. Today, she is a grandmother and lives in Bat Yam, Israel.

"That was the beginning of the ransoming," Feld Carr said. "I realized there are ways to do it. That's how it started. It got big time after that, slowly, slowly."

Financed through private, secret donations from Canadian Jews, Feld Carr's rescue operation kept growing, as word spread in the Syrian Jewish community.

She did not initiate the escape attempts. The Jews had to find her. "I never asked anybody to leave. They would try every way to get out. And then they'd hear about this lady in Canada named Ms. Judy. And that's how it would work."

Over 28 years, Feld Carr spearheaded a massive exodus, sometimes smuggling out prisoners, sometimes entire families, who sought a new life in the free world.

She was not the only player in the field, she said. "There were more than 4,600 Jews in the country" when she started. The others either got out by themselves or were helped by the Israelis.

While the Arab press still accuses Feld Carr of being a Mossad spy, she is adamant that she operated totally independently. In the beginning of her mission, the Israeli secret service was actually not too fond of her doings, she said.

"Let's face it: I'm a mommy who lives in Toronto. I'm not an expert in foreign intrigue… It doesn't blend at all with what my former profession was and being a mother of six kids. But the fact was that, after a long period of time, some of the men and women who were in the [Mossad] certainly respected what I was doing."

Once the refugees managed to leave Syria, Feld Carr would not seek to get in touch with them – in fact, she said, she avoided meeting the Jews she rescued.

"They would make these huge lunches and dinners and buy me presents and flowers and jewelry – things they couldn't afford. I don't want that," she said. "The only ones I had some contact with were the ones I took out of prisons – because they needed a lot of stroking and a lot of hugging."

Judy Feld Carr

In 2001, Feld Carr concluded her mission, thinking that there were only about 30 Jews left in the country, who were not interested in leaving. (The U.S. State Department in 2005 estimated there to be "approximately 80 Jews" in Syria, but admitted that it was difficult to obtain accurate population figures.)

"As far as I was concerned, I was finished; there was hardly anybody left. The ones that were left were older people who I thought chose to stay because they don't have children."

Today, she estimates there to be no more than perhaps 16 Jews remaining in Syria. "If they are even still alive, they must be much older people," she said. "It was their choice to stay. I could've done it. But you can't make people leave the country."

Feld Carr has never stepped on Syrian territory – for security reasons, she said. "You wouldn't be talking to me today if I had been there. Because there were threats against my life all the way through. This was very dangerous work that I was doing. This is why I was so quiet with all of this. It was very secret what I was doing."

Only in the mid-1990s, with her work mostly completed, did it become public knowledge, and she received the recognition that earlier would have jeopardized the entire mission.

"Word cannot express my gratitude to you for 23 years of hard and dangerous work," then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin wrote to Feld Carr in 1995. "Very few people, if any, have contributed as greatly as you have. The Jews of Syria who were rescued and the State of Israel owe you so much, and will never be able to reward you as you deserve."

Since then, the grandmother of 13 has received countless honours, awards and medals. One of the accolades that means the most to her is the Order of Canada, the country's highest civilian honour, because her case was the first time it was awarded for saving Jews, she said.

Then, just weeks ago, Feld Carr was one of the six first recipients of the Presidential Award of Distinction, which Shimon Peres established earlier this year to honour "individuals who have made an outstanding contribution to the State of Israel or to humanity, through their talents, services, or in any other form."

"That was so amazing and so overwhelming," she said of the ceremony during which Peres presented the award at his Jerusalem residence. "It's difficult to put into words how honoured I was."

On the very same night, June 18, she was also awarded the Queen Elizabeth II Diamond Jubilee Medal. "It was interesting, two medals on the same day," she said.

Since she was in Israel, she sent one of her daughters to pick it up.

Carrots on the menu for a healthy New Year

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Carrots are always on my yom tov menu when it comes to the High Holidays. The biggest decision is to decide how to prepare and serve them. The Yiddish word for carrots is "mehren," which means to multiply or increase, and there are multiple ways to prepare and serve them. Serve carrot coins in your homemade chicken soup or as a garnish for gefilte fish, grate raw carrots into a colourful, crunchy salad, transform pureed carrots into kugel, maybe even bake them in a scrumptious carrot cake –everyone will surely ask for more!

Gil Marks, author of five cookbooks including the Encyclopedia of Jewish Food (Wiley), recently made aliyah to Israel, where he continues to research and write about Jewish food. Marks' knowledge of food and its history is immense. He offers up a lengthy description of the carrot in the Encyclopedia of Jewish Food. The Hebrew name for carrot (gezer) is the same as the Hebrew word for tear, indicating that any unfavourable heavenly decrees should be torn up.

Marks shares information about the evolution of the carrot. The original wild carrot was quite different from its sweet, elegant, orange descendent. The roots were primarily used as medicine, while the parsley-like leaves were picked as an herb and the seeds were treated as a spice.

Around the early 15th century, carrots became a significant European food, emerging as one of the foremost vegetables in the cookery of central European Jews, a position it would shortly achieve among the Jews of eastern Europe as well. Eastern Europeans viewed raw carrots as unhealthy and only ate them cooked.

It was in northwestern Africa that carrots, both cooked and raw, became the featured component of salads. Moroccans brought raw carrot salads to Israel in the 1940s, where they are often flavored with oil, lemon juice, garlic, cumin and chilis. (The addition of honey and apple makes my Carrot Cranberry Salad a perfect choice for the holiday table.)

Marks also describes the evolution of tzimmes, a sweetened root vegetable stew that sometimes includes meat. An Ashkenazi Rosh Hashanah dish containing carrots, it is enhanced with honey to symbolically usher in a sweet year. The round shape of sliced carrots resembles gold coins, expressing hopes for a prosperous year and the addition of various fruits represents good wishes for a sweet, fruitful year.

Marks explains, "A tzimmes containing meat, fruit, and any other possibilities is a 'gantze tzimmes,' which is also any deluxe version or big production."

Gil Marks' tzimmes is definitely a deluxe addition to your yom tov table.

NORENE'S CARROT CRANBERRY SALAD

This scrumptious salad contains carrots, apples and honey, making it a "grate" choice for the High Holidays. A food processor speeds up preparation.

8 medium carrots (4 cups grated)
2 granny smith or royal gala apples, peeled and cored
3 tbsp. minced fresh parsley
1 cup dried cranberries
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. orange juice
1/4 cup honey
1/4 cup extra-virgin olive oil
salt and pepper to taste

Grate carrots and transfer to a large bowl. Grate apples and add to carrots. Add parsley and dried cranberries. Add juices, honey, oil, salt and pepper and toss to combine. Cover and refrigerate before serving. Serve chilled. Yield: 8 servings. Multiplies easily. Keeps 2 to 3 days in the refrigerator.

CARROT KUGEL

This carrot kugel can be made gluten-free by using potato starch instead of flour. You can serve it hot or at room temperature so there's no worry about serving straggling arrivals at the holiday table. It's a winner!

2 lb. carrots, cut in chunks
1/2 cup almonds
1/4 cup brown sugar, lightly packed
6 eggs
1/4 cup potato starch or all-purpose flour
1/3 cup honey
1/2 cup oil
2 tsp. vanilla extract or wine
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. cinnamon

Cook carrots in boiling salted water until tender, about 20 minutes. Drain well and let cool.

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 9x13-in. glass baking dish with nonstick spray.

In a food processor fitted with the steel blade, process almonds and brown sugar until crumbly, 8 to 10 seconds. Remove from bowl and set aside.

Purée carrots until smooth, 20 to 25 seconds. Add eggs and mix well. Add potato starch, honey, oil, vanilla, baking powder and cinnamon. Process until smooth, about 30 seconds longer. Scrape down sides of bowl once or twice.

Pour mixture into prepared baking dish and sprinkle with reserved almond mixture. Bake about 1 hour, until nicely browned. Makes 12 servings.

Keeps 2 to 3 days in the refrigerator. Reheats and/or freezes well.

MOIST 'N LUSCIOUS CARROT CAKE

This low-fat carrot cake is fabulous for the High Holidays. I usually bake it in a rectangular pan and omit the frosting, but for a more festive presentation, you can bake it in two layer cake pans and fill and frost it with Pareve Cream Cheese Frosting.

Tzimmes perfect for every taste

6 medium carrots (3 cups grated)
2 eggs
3 tbsp. canola oil
1 3/4 cups sugar
2 tsp. vanilla
3/4 cup unsweetened applesauce
2-1/2 cups flour (you can use half whole wheat flour)
1-1/2 tsp. baking powder
1-1/2 tsp. baking soda
1 tbsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. wheat germ
1/2 cup grated bittersweet chocolate
pareve Cream Cheese Frosting, optional (recipe follows)
additional grated chocolate for garnish (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 9x13-in. baking pan or two 9-in. round layer pans with nonstick spray.

Grate carrots, measure 3 cups and set aside.

In a food processor or electric mixer, beat eggs, oil, sugar, vanilla and applesauce until light, about 2 to 3 minutes. Add grated carrots and mix well.

In a large bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon, salt and wheat germ. Add to batter and mix briefly, just until flour disappears. Fold in grated chocolate.

Pour batter into prepared pan(s). Bake 9x13-in. cake for 45 to 50 minutes, layers for 25 to 30 minutes. To test for doneness, insert a toothpick into the centre of the cake. It should come out clean, with no batter clinging to it.

For layer cakes, let cool 15 minutes, then invert and remove from pans. Cool completely. Fill and frost with Pareve Cream Cheese Frosting and garnish with grated chocolate. Yield: 15 servings. Freezes well.

Pareve Cream Cheese Frosting

2 cups icing sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup Tofutti cream cheese
1/4 cup pareve margarine
2 tsp. lemon juice

In a food processor fitted with the steel blade, combine all ingredients and process until smooth, 10 to 15 seconds. Yields enough to fill and frost two 9-inch layers or a 9x13-in. cake. Freezes well.

GIL MARKS' ASHKENAZI STEWED ROOT VEGETABLES WITH BEEF (FLEISHIG TZIMMES)

Source: Encyclopedia of Jewish Food by Gil Marks (Wiley)

3 lb. beef brisket, flanken or chuck; or 4 lb. short ribs (whole or cut into 6 to 8 pieces)
2 tbsp. vegetable oil or schmaltz
2 medium onions, halved and sliced
1 to 1-1/2 lb. carrots, sliced into rounds
2 lb. (6 medium) sweet potatoes, peeled and quartered; or 1 lb. sweet potatoes and 1 lb. (3 medium) white potatoes, peeled and sliced; or 12 oz. parsnips, peeled and sliced
2 to 3 cups pitted prunes; or 1-1/2 cups prunes and 1-1/2 cups dried apricots or peaches (optional)
1/2 to 3/4 cup honey, granulated sugar, or brown sugar
2 bay leaves
about 1 tsp. table salt or 2 tsp. kosher salt ground black pepper to taste
3/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 whole cloves, pinch of ground cloves or dash of ground nutmeg
1/2 tsp. ground ginger (optional) about 4 cups water; or 2 cups water and 2 cups orange juice

Pat the meat dry with paper towels. In a large pot, roasting pan or heatproof dish, heat the oil over medium-high heat. Add the meat, without crowding the pan, and brown on all sides, about 10 minutes. Remove the meat.

Add the onions and sauté until soft and translucent, scraping up any browned bits on the bottom, about 10 minutes.

Return the meat to the pot. Add the carrots, sweet potatoes, optional prunes, honey, bay leaves, salt, pepper, cinnamon, cloves and, if using, ginger. Add enough water to cover.

Cover and bake in a 325-degree oven or simmer over a low heat until the meat is tender, 2-1/2 to 3 hours. Yield: 6 to 8 servings as a main course.

Top Chef judge publishes memoir – with recipes

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

I've never seen a single episode of The Sopranos and wouldn't know a Mentalist from a Person of Interest, but I'm a huge fan of Bravo TV's Emmy Award-winning show Top Chef, so when I found out Gail Simmons was coming to town, I was thrilled to snag an interview.

A regular judge on Top Chef and host of Top Chef: Just Desserts, Simmons was here in California for the L.A. Times Festival of Books at USC to promote her new memoir (with recipes), Talking With My Mouth Full: My Life as a Professional Eater, Hyperion.

Surprise, surprise. This sophisticated foodie, who on the show, regularly debates the merits of a gastrique or gelée with the likes of Eric Ripert and Anthony Bourdain, is a nice Jewish girl from Cedarvale in Toronto, whose parents, she said, were going to relish this story.

"I could win an Emmy and get on the cover of a magazine," she told me, "but being in The Canadian Jewish News really gets my parents excited!"

Simmons grew up in a traditional Jewish home, "celebrating the major holidays and observing rites of passage… with way too much food and a little prayer," she writes. There were three synagogues within walking distance, and she and her brothers had bat and bar mitzvahs. "The emphasis wasn't so much on religion as on deeply rooted tradition and family food and relaying the oral history of our people."

Shabbat dinner was special. "Friday night was a sacred night for our family," she told me. "We could be busy all week with soccer and dance, but on Friday night, my father came home early. All week we had dinner together in the kitchen, but on Friday night we ate in the dining room. My mother and I lit the candles, and my father did the blessings. There were always guests."

TV host favours Jewish classics

Simmons' father, Ivor, was born in South Africa, and her mother, Renée, has roots in Poland and Russia.

"It's the typical North American immigrant story," she said. "My grandfather left at age 14, and by 21, opened his own business. He was a dressmaker, in the schmatte business. My grandmother came at three or four. She got a job at 17 in my grandfather's company and married him at 18."

Renée was an accomplished cook who ran a small cooking school, so Simmons was raised to have a pretty sophisticated palate, developing a taste early on for leek quiche and pâté. A magnet on the family's refrigerator read: "A gourmet is just a glutton with brains."

Yet, the Jewish classics were always abundant. Simmons called her mother "an ambitious cook, ahead of her time, seeking great ingredients. But stuffed cabbage and matzah ball soup are very much in her repertoire. She made a mean chopped liver and gets mad at me for putting wine in the brisket." At 18, Simmons spent a summer in Israel working on a kibbutz. Then, after graduating from McGill University in Montreal, she had no idea what she wanted to do. A family friend advised her to make a list of the things she really enjoyed and go for it. Simmons wrote: Eat. Write. Travel. Cook. That list catapulted her onto an astonishing career trajectory.

"My instinct was to write a cookbook," she said. "But so many people kept asking me the same 20 or 30 questions, I decided to tell the story of my life, how I came to have the job that I have that didn't even exist 10 years ago. That's my book."

And what a story it is. With her eye on a career as a food writer, she attended culinary school in New York, landing positions at New York's legendary Le Cirque 2000 and Vong restaurants. She worked as assistant to Vogue magazine's food critic, Jeffrey Steingarten, and as events manager for renowned French chef Daniel Boulud, leading to a job at Food and Wine magazine where her duties included managing the magazine's iconic food festival, the Aspen Classic. It was during this period that she "fell into" her position as permanent judge on Top Chef.

Top Chef fans will love the book's insider views on the judging of the show – sometimes seven hours of deliberations are distilled into the 15 minutes we see on TV.

An attendee at the Festival of Books asked Simmons if anybody ever threw a fit after being eliminated. "If they threw a fit, we would show it!" she said. "We try to eliminate them with respect and are amazed they don't throw a fit. All-star Jennifer threw a bit of a fit and yelled at Tom [famed chef and head judge Tom Colicchio]. That was the best day in Tom's life. He loved it!"

KASHA AND BOWTIES WITH MUSHROOM GRAVY

5 tbsp. unsalted margarine, divided
2 large yellow onions, thinly sliced coarse salt
1 large egg
1 cup medium kasha, washed freshly ground black pepper
2 cups chicken stock
1 lb. farfalle pasta
1 garlic clove, minced
1 lb. mushrooms, mix of cremini, white, and shiitake, sliced
2 tbsp. flour
1/4 cup red wine
2 cups water
1 tbsp. thyme

Melt 2 tbsp. margarine in large sauté pan over medium heat. Reduce heat to low and sauté onions until fully caramelized, about 1 hour. Sprinkle 1 tsp. coarse salt over onions and begin scraping brown bits off bottom of pan. Remove onions to a bowl and set aside.

In medium mixing bowl, whisk egg until just beginning to foam. Add kasha and stir to ensure egg evenly coats all grains. Melt 1 tbsp. margarine in same pan, then add kasha. Sauté 5 minutes, then season with salt and pepper. Pour chicken stock over kasha, cover, and cook over low heat until all stock has been absorbed and kasha is tender, 15 to 25 minutes.

Meanwhile, bring large pot of salted water to boil. Cook farfalle to al dente according to package instructions. Reserve a cup of water before draining pasta.

When kasha is tender, combine it with noodles and onions in a large bowl, and set aside.

In kasha pan, melt remaining 2 tbsp. margarine. When margarine is starting to bubble, add garlic and mushrooms and sauté until well cooked and soft. Add flour and stir until no lumps remain, about 2 minutes. Deglaze pan with red wine. When three-quarters of liquid has evaporated from pan, pour water into pan and cook until gravy thickens, about 15 minutes; then add thyme to finish.

Portion kasha and bowties into bowls, ladle mushroom gravy over the top. Yield: 6 servings.

Merkel vows to prevent circumcision ban

Raphael Merkel
The Times of Israel

BERLIN — German Chancellor Angela Merkel said on Sunday that her government was hard at work trying to find a quick solution to the circumcision controversy raging in her country.

Last week, a criminal complaint was filed against a German rabbi for performing several hundred circumcisions. The charge came in the wake of a recent court decision which held that the rite, if performed for non-medical reasons, could be considered illegal.

"The chancellor considers the safeguarding of the Jewish religion and culture as a special obligation," an official in Merkel's office wrote in a letter to Rabbi Menachem Margolin, the CEO of the European Jewish Association, which has been active in trying to overturn the court ruling.

"The chancellor is very grateful that Jewish life has again found a place in Germany. Therefore the federal government takes this problem very seriously and is working intently on finding a swift solution for religiously motivated circumcisions. There shall be no doubt that the freedom of religion is a solid part of our democratic society."

The European Jewish Association was one of many Jewish advocacy groups that protested the complaint filed against Rabbi David Goldberg, the rabbi of the Bavarian town of Hof, and demanded the federal government in Berlin pass a law creating legal clarity for ritual circumcisors.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai and President Shimon Peres wrote to Merkel and German President Joachim Gauck, respectively, calling on German authorities to ensure that Jews can practice their rites in the country without fear of prosecution.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel

The court decision that prompted the complaint against Goldberg caused a major uproar in Germany's Jewish and Muslim communities, leading the Bundestag to pass a resolution underlining the right to ritual circumcision. "A medically professional circumcision of boys, which does not cause unnecessary pain," should be "generally permissible," the resolution read. All parties but the far-left Die Linke voted in favour of the resolution.

Already on Aug. 23, German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle made a statement similar to Merkel's, saying that Berlin must "ensure the possibility to keep Jewish and Muslim traditions without legal non-certainty" and that a clear agreement on the matter should be reached quickly.

Israel struck Syrian reactor after Americans refused

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Former prime minister Ehud Olmert ordered a strike on a Syrian nuclear reactor in 2007, immediately after then-U.S. president George W. Bush informed him that the Americans would not attack the facility, according to a Channel 10 report aired this past Sunday evening.

Bush's deputy national security adviser Elliot Abrams was present when the president called Olmert on Sept. 6, 2007, and made clear that the United States would not take action, and that secretary of state Condoleezza Rice would fly to Israel to hold a joint press conference with Olmert to alert the international community about the secret reactor. The United States had decided to handle the Syrian threat via diplomacy.

Olmert responded that the secretary's visit would not be necessary and that Israel would deal with the nuclear facility on its own.

"If you're not going to act against the reactor, then we are," Abrams quoted Olmert as saying during the teleconference. "You don't want to know where or when," the former prime minister reportedly added.

The Israelis were convinced that time was fairly short and they had to strike the reactor – built by the Syrians with extensive input from the North Koreans – before it went live, the Sunday TV report said.

Israel has never claimed responsibility for the strike, named Operation Orchard, which occurred shortly after midnight on the same day. And Syria has never acknowledged that its nuclear reactor was destroyed.

According to Abrams, three hours after the strike, Olmert called Bush and spoke briefly regarding the mission.

"I did what was necessary," Abrams quoted Olmert as saying.

To which Bush simply replied, "I thank you."

The Channel 10 report said Defence Minister Ehud Barak was initially against the strike, possibly because of personal political considerations. However, the only minister who actually voted against taking out the reactor was Avi Dichter.

Dozens of Syrians were killed in the strike, as well as 10 North Koreans who were presumed to have been helping with technical aspects of the secret facility, the TV report said.

The show was broadcast amid reports in recent days that Israel is considering a strike against Iran's nuclear facilities. In contrast to the public silence before the Syrian strike and before Israel's 1981 raid that destroyed Saddam Hussein's reactor at Osirak, however, the question of whether Israel should resort to military intervention against Iran's nuclear facilities has been the subject of feverish public debate for months.

With Iran as with Syria, however, the Americans are urging that more time be given to diplomacy, and the Israelis are stressing the urgent imperative for action.

More than 150,000 Holocaust restitution claims submitted

JTA

NEW YORK — More than 150,000 applications have been submitted for restitution of Jewish owned property lost during the Holocaust.

The number was reported by Project HEART – the Holocaust Era Asset Restitution Taskforce, which seeks to help individuals with restitution for property that was confiscated, looted, or forcibly sold during the Holocaust. It is a nonprofit initiative of the Government of Israel in co-operation with the Jewish Agency for Israel and numerous other groups.

"Many Jewish Holocaust survivors had property confiscated, looted or forcibly sold by the Nazis or their collaborators during the Holocaust era and most have received no compensation for their lost assets," Bobby Brown, executive director of Project HEART, said in a statement.

Project HEART formed in February 2011. By December that year, due to the overwhelming response of Holocaust survivors and their heirs, Israel's government decided to extend the deadline for submitting questionnaires regarding their eligibility to gain restitution or compensation for the property they or their relatives lost during the World War II era.

"The issue of identifying Jewish property is still a central challenge even 70 years after World War II," Leah Nass, Israel's deputy minister of senior citizens, said in a statement. "In order to promote this issue we need to put international pressure and to do all that we can to do justice for the survivors, the Holocaust victims and their families."

Israel an 'anchor of cooperation with NASA'

That agreement paved the way for the training of the first Israeli astronaut, Ilan Ramon, at the Johnson Space Center for five years, starting in 1998 in preparation for his mission on the Space Shuttle Columbia. That shuttle tragically exploded upon re-entry into the Earth's atmosphere on Feb. 1, 2003, killing all on board.

In 2004, NASA established a memorial for Ramon at Thomas Lee Inlet, on the north shore of Devon Island off Cape Canaveral in Florida.

Ramon's ill-fated flight was Israel's most famous foray into outer space, but its technology and equipment have made the journey numerous times.

Among Israeli innovations is one used to keep astronauts healthy: the Vivid-q Cardiovascular Ultrasound system, developed by GE Healthcare's R&D lab in Israel. The system monitors astronauts on the International Space Station to determine the long-term impact of "captivity" in space on the human body. NASA is using the system in several studies, including one called the Integrated Cardiovascular study, which is exploring the effect of space travel on the heart.

One of the consequences of long-term residence in space, scientists say, is a condition called cardiac atrophy, in which the heart gets weaker and can even get smaller. The study, which has been ongoing for several years, is trying to determine just how badly long-duration space flight impacts the heart.

Israel's representative agency in its agreement with NASA is the Israel Space Agency, the official government body that deals with space travel. But there are a number of private and academic institutions in Israel that are also highly involved in space matters, among them the Fisher Institute for Strategic Air and Space Studies.

The Fisher Institute signed an agreement recently with NanoRacks, a private U.S. contractor to NASA, to develop equipment and experiments for NASA missions. As part of the agreement, several Israeli biomedical experiments were conducted on the final mission of NASA's Endeavour space shuttle earlier this year.

Israel's space technology provides benefits beyond increasing humanity's knowledge of what lies beyond. Based on its research for space flight, the Fisher Institute recently introduced the MedUAV, a "doctor in a drone" device that can be used to treat people whom medical personnel may not be able to reach for hours.

The MedUAV flies under remote control, transporting in all the gear necessary for treatment of the injured. It is equipped with the technology to administer tests or even drugs. The device is monitored and controlled remotely by a doctor, who can check the patient's readings when he or she is hooked up to it. In addition, if there is someone present to help the injured person, the doctor can use voice and even video to instruct the field worker on how to use the equipment properly.

When he signed NASA's latest agreement with the Israel Space Agency in 2010, NASA director Charles Bolden said the agency "welcomes the growing strategic cooperation with Israel.

"Israel is one of the anchors of co-operation with NASA, along with several other countries. We will consider expansion of co-operation on other applications in space exploration and development of integrated technologies" with Israel, Bolden added.

Israel Briefs

Israeli NGO advises on disabled

The UN Economic and Social Council has named an Israeli NGO as a special consultant on assisting disabled children. The inclusion will allow Beit Issie Shapiro to "provide Israeli expertise in the field of disability rights and represent the innovations coming out of Israel," according to the organization's website. The council has 54 member states, including Egypt, Iraq, Libya and Qatar. Israel is not a member. Beit Issie Shaipro was founded in 1980 and is now helping 30,000 children in Israel, according to its website. The organization helps train thousands of therapists in Israel with its new therapies, and conducts research and shares best practices internationally. Beit Issie Shapiro has a centre in Kalansawa, an Arab city in Israel. Children from the West Bank are regularly brought to Beit Issie Shapiro for treatment, Jean Judes, the NGO's executive director, said.

Egypt assures Israel

Egypt's defence minister reportedly told his Israeli counterpart that Egypt is committed to its peace accord with Israel. The call between Egypt's Abdel Fattah el-Sissi and Israel's Ehud Barak was initiated by el-Sissi, according to Al-Hayat, a London-based newspaper. The conversation between the two defence ministers is the highest-level direct contact between the neighbouring countries since a popular revolution in Egypt saw the overthrow of longtime leader Hosni Mubarak and the subsequent election of an Islamist-dominated government. Officials on both sides have said there have been constant low-level contacts between the two countries. Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi, a Muslim Brotherhood leader, appointed el-Sissi earlier this month. El-Sissi reportedly phoned Barak recently to calm fears in Jerusalem over Egypt's military buildup in the Sinai, which Cairo says is needed to root out terrorist elements from the largely lawless peninsula. Al-Hayat quoted an unnamed, senior Egyptian military source as saying that Barak and el-Sessi had reached an agreement on the matter, the details of which are not clear.

Campaign to reform Rabbinate

The Tzohar Rabbinical Organization has launched a public information campaign designed to encourage a new approach to religious leadership within the Israeli Chief Rabbinate. The campaign includes newspaper and bus advertisements, as well as a mission statement outlining the organization's vision for a revised Chief Rabbinate, which was distributed to more than 200,000 people last weekend. The items that Tzohar is calling for include the election of new rabbinical court judges who would be more open to the needs of the general public, not just the observant sectors, as well as new guidelines for managing the marriage, divorce and conversion processes in Israel. These three areas have been particularly notorious in alienating the secular community.

Abbas denies Jerusalem's Jewish heritage

JTA

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem's identity is Arab, and the city's Islamic and Christian holy sites must be protected from Israeli threats, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said.

Abbas also said that Israeli authorities want to build a Jewish temple on the site of the Al-Aksa mosque and Dome of the Rock, in a statement issued on Aug. 21 on the anniversary of an attempted arson of the Al-Aksa Mosque in 1969 by an Australian Christian, who was later found to be insane.

"Their ultimate goal is to rob Muslims and Christians of their holy shrines, destroy the Al-Aksa mosque and build the alleged Jewish temple," he said.

He also said that Israeli excavation work in Jerusalem, and in the Western Wall tunnels beneath the mosque, "will not undermine the fact that the city will forever be Arabic, Islamic and Christian."

Abbas concluded that there will be "no peace or stability before our beloved city and eternal capital is liberated from occupation and settlement." The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) reacted harshly to Abbas' denial of Jewish heritage in Jerusalem.

Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO, called the PA leader's comments "offensive" and "disgusting" in an e-mail statement to The CJN.

"It speaks to the very core of the conflict: the refusal of the Palestinians – and indeed broader Arab world – to acknowledge the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty over and repatriation to our ancestral homeland. Until that rejectionism ends, there can be no real hope of peace," he said.

"On a personal note, I would have hoped that our direct encounters would have had a greater impact. Leaders cannot just pander to the most base instincts of their constituencies – they have to lead them beyond a parochial worldview towards understanding and appreciation of objective truth," he said.

CIJA representatives met with Abbas earlier this summer when its leadership, including Fogel, visited Israel in an attempt to negotiate with the PA on behalf of the Canadian Jewish community and as a quasi-political representative on behalf of the Canadian government.

U.S., Israel, Jewish groups worry about Iran's summit

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — The decision last week by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to attend the 16th triennial event Non-Aligned Movement triennial summit in Tehran from Aug. 29-31 has set off alarm bells in Washington and Jerusalem.

U.S. State Department spokesperson Victoria Nuland, reiterated, after Ban's announcement, "concerns that Iran is going to manipulate this opportunity and the attendees to try to deflect attention from its own failings." U.S. Jewish groups that deal with the United Nations echoed that apprehension.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Aug. 12 urged Ban not to attend – and, in a rare diplomatic breach, made the plea public.

"Even if it is not your intention, your visit will grant legitimacy to a regime that is the greatest threat to world peace and security," Netanyahu told Ban in the phone call, according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office.

Israel and the West are locked in a diplomatic struggle with Iran to force the Islamic Republic to make more transparent a nuclear program it insists is peaceful but that western intelligence agencies say is intended to produce a bomb.

Ban Ki-moon

The non-aligned summit sharpens tensions between Israel and western nations over whether diplomacy and sanctions have been played out. Netanyahu believes they have and is pressing the Obama administration to make more specific the military consequences should Iran not comply. Obama administration officials are in turn pressing Israel to stand down from rhetoric that suggests an Israeli strike is imminent.

The Non-Aligned Movement is a 1960s relic that once brought together nations seeking to resist being co-opted by the United States or the Soviet Union. With the summit, Iran assumes presidency of the movement. Thirty leaders of about 120 member nations plan to attend the 16th triennial summit.

"It's a lot of posturing and photo-ops," said Alireza Nader, an analyst at the Rand Corporation, a think-tank that often consults with the U.S. government. "But the fact that Iran is hosting the summit and the fact that the UN secretary general is going and especially that Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi is showing up are good public relations moves.

"Iran has in recent months tried to boost relationships with Egypt, but Egyptians have been relatively standoffish. They haven't embraced Iran," Nader added.

Alireza Miryousefi, the Iranian envoy to the UN, wrote in an Aug. 21 letter to the Washington Post that in "light of its focus on multilateral co-operation... sustainable world peace... and horizontal relations defying hegemonic structures, the [movement] is a major cross-regional group in the United Nations, and UN leaders have always participated in its summits..."

It is precisely the exploitation of such symbolism that concerns Jewish groups, said Michael Salberg, the director of international affairs for the Anti-Defamation League.

"Symbols matter, and when the symbol is represented by the secretary general of the United Nations, it's a neon light – and that makes it all the more troubling at a difficult time," Salberg said.

The concern, said David Harris, the director of the American Jewish Committee, is that the "gathering grants legitimacy to the Iranian leadership's unvarnished and incessant antisemitism."

State Department spokesperson Nuland said, "We hope that those who have chosen to attend, including UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, will make very strong points to those Iranians that they meet about their international obligations. For them to begin to come clean on their nuclear program and to solve this particular issue diplomatically."

Ban suggested in his announcement that he got the message. "With respect to the Islamic Republic of Iran, the secretary general will use the opportunity to convey the clear concerns and expectations of the international community..." it said. "These include Iran's nuclear program, terrorism, human rights and the crisis in Syria."

Salberg said such caveats paled next to the symbolism of Ban's participation. "It says, you can act with impunity, you can say what you want, and I'm still going to come, the embodiment of the international community," he said.

Journalist explains technology in plain English

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In 1997, at the start of the technology boom, an aspiring consumer technology expert established his credibility when he correctly predicted the revolutionary effect MP3 files would have on the music industry.

Having spent the last 15 years building a successful career as a technology journalist, author, radio host and TV personality, it's tough not to take Marc Saltzman's latest predictions seriously – even if he's talking about flying cars or robotic sous chefs.

"Flying cars are coming out next year," Saltzman told The CJN as he boarded an airplane on his way to a business trip.

As he described in an article published in the Toronto Star last year, the Transtion, a "roadable aircraft" with retractable wings, will have to use local airports to take off and land like any other small aircraft, but it can be driven on our roads and parked in our garages.

According to his award-winning technology blog Sync.ca, Saltzman predicts that by the end of the decade, modern homes will have cutting-edge innovations that will make microwaves and dishwashers seem primitive.

He said kitchen appliances will be wired to download recipes and display them on flat-panel screens.

"Your entire kitchen table might be a video screen, in case you want to catch up on your favourite television shows while eating alone, while also reading email, surfing the web and using your finger to flip through digital recipes," he wrote.

Passionate about bringing technology to laypeople

Saltzman predicts that the technology is going to evolve from touch to talk.

"The gadgets are going to get smarter," he said.

Smart phones will become "the most critical gadget we carry. It will be our lifeline to the world. It's going to interact with our homes, our cars and our offices. I already call them our digital Swiss army knives," he said.

Marc Saltzman

Saltzman said he's passionate about bringing technology to laypeople, and turning "geek speak into street speak.

"That's been my whole mandate... to make sense of technology. Not just to serve as a technology evangelist or enthusiast, but also a translator."

He said evolving from a video-game enthusiast into a technology expert who news outlets such as CNN rely on took a lot of persistence and "good old-fashioned Jewish chutzpah."

His journey into forging a career as a tech expert began when he realized he had a knack for explaining the appeal of video games to an adult audience.

"But to be honest, the motivation was that I didn't want to pay $70 for games, and I thought if I reviewed them, companies would send them to me for free," he said with a laugh.

Saltzman became even more motivated when publications began paying him for his articles.

"I would then use one publication as a springboard to get into another publication."

But freelancing for newspapers and web-based magazines was just the beginning for Saltzman.

"I had no radio experience, but in 1997, I walked into 102.1 The Edge – it was CFNY back then – and I said, 'You should put me on the air every week for a segment to talk about what's hot on the web. It was called Marc's Web Watch and I did it live every Monday."

His big break came in 2001 – while he was working as Global TV's tech expert – when Peter Kent, who was then a broadcast journalist on Global, wrote a letter to a contact at Turner Broadcasting Systems in Atlanta, the media group that created CNN.

"I was not only brought in for an interview, but the guy I interviewed with brought me into the office of the president of CNN and said, 'This guy can explain technology in plain English. He can make it fun and understandable.'"

To this day, he does his segments for CNN from his Richmond Hill home via Skype.

In spite of having his byline appear in more than 50 North American publications, hosting three Tech Talk radio shows on NewsTalk 1010, and appearing regularly on television newscasts, it wasn't until he landed a gig with Cineplex Entertainment that people started recognizing him.

"Cineplex asked me four years ago to create a one-minute tech segment called Gear Guide that airs before the movie starts," he said, adding that the segment is seen in 95 per cent of Canadian theatres by about six million people each month.

"Who would have ever thought that along with movies and music, that they would want a technology update before a movie started? That was unheard of just a few years ago, when tech was something reserved for the hard-core users, a very small minority of people," Saltzman said.

"I think a majority of the population enjoys technology and they like hearing about and buying new gadgets and games and whatnot, but they just need a little help in understanding it. The industry changes so quickly. There are new products all the time. There is a whole new language we need to learn... It can make your head spin."

The author of 14 technology-themed books, Saltzman hopes his 15th book, titled Siri For Dummies, will help people stay current.

Saltzman himself knows how important it is for him to stay ahead of the trends. In October, he'll be travelling to Israel on a tour organized by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

"I'll be going to Israel to visit more than 20 technology companies. It's a trip I'm organizing with CIJA, and I'm joining a delegation of high-tech journalists from Canada," he saud.

"There is a ton of innovation happening in Israel. A lot of the technologies we use today were designed and developed in Israel. A lot of people aren't aware of the amount of innovation that comes out of Israel."

Rhapsody 1939-45 was composed in a DP camp

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto-based composer Leo Spellman's Rhapsody 1939-45 will have its Canadian prèmiere at the Ashkenaz Festival.

Born Leo Szpilman in Poland 99 years ago, Spellman has teamed up with Paul Hoffert, the award-winning musician and co-founder of the famed Canadian classic band Lighthouse, and recipient of the Order of Canada, who will be conducting an orchestra of 30. If his health permits, Spellman will attend the performance and say a few words.

Rhapsody 1939-1945 depicts three distinct themes – the horror of war, the sadness of loss and the hope for a better tomorrow. The first section paints a sonic picture of bombs falling, machine-gun fire and troops marching. The second is a mournful lamentation evoking profound despair. The third part is full of joyful klezmer music themes that remind us that even in adversity, there is strength, passion, resilience and hope at the heart of the soul of the Jewish People. The work builds to a hopeful and ecstatic finale, referencing Hatikvah and the establishment of the Jewish State of Israel, shortly after the piece was composed.

Leo Spellman

"The work has captivating and memorable melodies," says Hoffert.

Spellman's Rhapsody 1939-1945 was composed in 1947 in a German displaced persons' (DP) camp. Spellman moved to Canada after the war and kept the score packed in a suitcase for 50 years. In Canada, Spellman established himself as a composer, concert pianist and cantorial accompanist. He was also the music director of the Toronto Jewish Theatre.

Spellman comes from a revered musical dynasty in Poland that spans over a century, and includes his cousin, Wladyslaw Szpilman, portrayed in the Oscar-winning Roman Polanski film, The Pianist.

It was at Wladyslaw's suggestion that the piece was performed for the first time in North America at the Holocaust survivor's conference in Washington, D.C., in 2000. In the fall of 2011, with Hoffert's help, Spellman expanded and recorded it with a 15-piece orchestra conducted by Hoffert.

Spellman contacted Hoffert after the composer's children encouraged him to record the piece so there would be a permanent record of this composition. "Leo called me directly and he auditioned me for the job… and somehow I passed the audition," says Hoffert with a chuckle.

"I've conducted recordings and live performances from everything from Stravinsky to Beethoven. This work [is] one of the important works of the 20th century that was lost for 60 years. It is a blessing for everybody that it was found and now recorded, and it will be a concert in Canada so the wonderful talent of Leo Spellman can be shared in his lifetime and thereafter."

Hoffert said he is pleased that Ashkenaz is presenting the concert. "It is very important for the Jewish community to hear this because there are very few artistic works about the Holocaust written by survivors that exist."

Hoffert says Spellman, whom The CJN was unable to interview due to his poor health, is thrilled with the news that this work will finally be performed in Canada and that his family, friends and colleagues will be able hear it in concert for the first time.

Paul Hoffert is not the only Hoffert smitten by the Spellman's talent and charm. Paul and Brenda Hoffert's son, David, an award-winning film and television documentary director, also joined "Team Spellman."

"David met Leo while Leo and I were working on the orchestration and fell in love with him as we did, and immediately decided that his life story should be documented while he was alive to provide the first-hand details," Hoffert said.

The Rhapsody 1939-1945 CD will be sold at the concert and is also available from Hoffert Communications at: brend@hoffert.ca.

The concert will be performed on Sept. 3, at 6 p.m. at the Enwave Theatre at Harbourfront Centre. For tickets, call 416-973-4000 or visit online at www.harbourfrontcentre.com. Tickets are $25 in advance/$30 at the door.

Amazing lineup of Jewish-interest films at TIFF

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Toronto International Film Festival, which starts on Sept. 6, has an amazing lineup of Jewish-interest, Israeli and Mideast films.

A sampler:

Zaytoun, directed by Eran Riklis and starring Stephen Dorf, is set in Lebanon during Israel's invasion in 1982. It is the unlikely story of an Israeli pilot who meets a 12-year-old Palestinian after his plane is shot down over Beirut. The boy is initially mistrustful of the downed Israeli, but as they get to know each other, they form something of a friendship.

In The Attack, by Ziad Doueiri of France, an Arab surgeon living in Tel Aviv discovers a dark secret about his wife in the aftermath of a Palestinian suicide bombing. Best known for his award-winning film West Beirut, Doueiri was a camera assistant to Quentin Tarantino in Reservoir Dogs and Pulp Fiction.

Michael Mayer's Out in the Dark is about life and love in the shadows. Nimer, a Palestinian graduate student from the West Bank, meets, Roy, an Israeli lawyer. As their relationship blossoms, Nimer confronts the harsh reality of an Arab society that rejects his sexual identity and a Jewish society that rejects his nationality.

Dror Moreh's The Gatekeepers is a documentary focusing on six former directors of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence agency. These hardened men reflect on their contributions to Israel's war against terrorism. Safe Room, by Canadian filmmaker Elizabeth Lazebnik, is a semi-autobiographical account of an ex-Israeli who lived through the 1991 Gulf War, when Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles into Israel and terrorized the country.

Evgeny Ruman's Igor & the Cranes' Journey turns on the challenges that an 11-year-old Jewish boy and his father face as they immigrate from Russia to Israel.

In Eagles, by Dror Sabo, two elderly Israeli reservists alienated from Israeli society embark on a vigilante campaign to bring justice and respect to the streets of Tel Aviv.

Rama Burshtein's Fill the Void unfolds in Tel Aviv as a young woman grapples with a highly charged quandary. Shira, the youngest daughter in a chassidic family, is engaged to be married. But joy crumbles into despair when her marriage is postponed due to an untimely event. As a result, Shira must choose between her heart's desire and her family duty.

Dan Setton, in State 194, documents the unsuccessful quest by the Palestinian Authority to gain recognition of Palestinian statehood at the United Nations in 2012. Setton, an Israeli, gained unprecedented access to Palestinian Authority leaders, including Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, who has attempted to plant the seeds of statehood in incremental steps.

The Palestinians are featured in several other films.

In Anais Barbeau-Lavalette's Inch'Allah, a young Canadian physician working in a Palestinian refugee camp in the West Bank discovers the Arab-Israeli dispute on a personal and visceral level.

Annemarie Jacir's When I Saw You takes place in a Palestinian refugee camp shortly after Israel's victory in the Six Day War, and is the tale of an 11-year-old boy, a free spirit, who dreams of better days somewhere else.

A World Not Ours, by Mahdi Fleifel, is filmed in a Palestinian refugee camp in southern Lebanon. The director, a Palestinian raised in that camp and now living in Denmark, reconnects with old friends, who speak of their lives and vent their grievances.

The internal rebellions that rocked the Arab world are the subject of two films: Hala Alabdalla's As If We Were Catching a Cobra and Yousry Nasrallah's After the Battle. Alabdalla's documentary focuses on Egypt and Syria, while Nasrallah's feature film is exclusively about the revolution in Egypt.

Ruba Nadda's Inescapable is a thriller is about a Syrian expatriate who returns to Damascus to look for his missing daughter amid chaos in Syria.

Argo, directed by and starring Ben Affleck, returns to the 1979 hostage crisis in Iran. Iranian militants storm the U.S. embassy in Tehran, causing the flight of six Americans. A CIA agent devises a daring plan to get them out of the country before they are found and captured.

The Reluctant Fundamentalist, directed by Canadian Mira Nair, is a political thriller based on a bestseller of the same name. A Pakistani Muslim who has achieved success on Wall Street finds himself himself embroiled in a conflict between the allure of the American dream and the call of his homeland.

Cate Shortland's Lore is set in postwar Germany as a young woman, the scion of imprisoned Nazis, leads her siblings across a war-torn country. During the trip, she meets a Jewish refugee, an encounter that forces her to reassess her hateful views.

Hannah Arendt, a biopic from the German director Margarethe von Trotta, is about a renowned German-Jewish philosopher who sparked controversy in the wake of the Eichmann trial in Jerusalem. In this film, Arendt, a refugee from Nazi Germany, struggles with the pain of the past and the turmoil of the present.

Barry Avrich's documentary, Show Stopper: The Theatrical Life of Garth Drabinsky, is about the rise and fall of a dazzling but reckless Canadian show-business entrepreneur.

In The Last White Knight, Canadian filmmaker and former civil rights worker Paul Saltzman goes back to Mississippi to meet a racist who physically attacked him in the 1960s. Saltzman's documentary is about the new South, the old South and the possibilities of reconciliation.

Dybbuk author's early mentors were radical thinkers

The subtitle of Gabriella Safran's excellent new biography of S. An-sky – Wandering Soul: The Dybbuk's Creator (Yale) – leaves a great deal to the imagination. True, after An-sky's death, The Dybbuk went on to become one of the most commonly presented Yiddish language plays of the modern era, but its author's role in the cultural and daily politics of pre- and post-World War I Europe is such that something more protean seems due to him.

Born in Vitebsk in 1863 as Shloyme-Zanvl Rappoport, he worked and wrote under the Russified pseudonym Semyon Akimovich An-sky. In his youth he was surrounded by the chassidic shtiblach of a bustling market town, as well as the idealism of its secularizing and politicized culture. Following years abroad, writing and joining activist groups in Paris and Bern, Switzerland, he found work as a teacher among Russian peasants and miners. At the same time, An-sky wrote novels and collected ethnographic portraits of rural and town life, which led him to consider the future of Jewish life in the Russian empire. His early models and mentors were Russian radical thinkers and the Socialist Revolutionary agitators who were responsible for the assassination of czarist ministers.

An-sky's itinerant nature, his broad political and creative commitments, and the absence of a rooted family life all contributed to his presence and influence at major events of the early 20th century. While among the Russian miners and peasants, he involved himself in the early stages of revolutionary work that would prove so attractive to the disaffected among Russian Jewish youth. In Bern, amongst the fervent Russian émigré community, he allied himself with influential Socialist Revolutionary party members and Bundists, who would, in the years to come, compete with and collapse before the more ruthless Bolsheviks under Lenin. During his years in Paris, he wrote newspaper articles about the Dreyfus scandal. After Russia's 1905 uprising, he witnessed and reported on the 1906 Bialystok pogrom.

In the pre-World War I era, An-sky's ethnographic interests shifted, and he began a number of projects meant to collect and preserve Russian Jewish shtetl heritage. Among these was an ethnographic museum in St. Petersburg, and two important ethnographic missions, which he made with a photographer and sound recorder, to numerous villages in the Pale of Settlement.

An-sky's idealism regarding populism and Russian culture was put most cruelly to the test as he travelled with aid organizations during the Russian army's occupation and retreat from Galicia during World War I. The disastrous policy of evacuating entire Jewish communities from the front and associated pogroms led An-sky to undertake his major work, The Destruction of Galicia, on which he was still working when he died in 1920.

What An-sky witnessed represented the worst example, prior to the Nazi onslaught, of modern destruction of Jewish communities. Safran describes An-sky's arrival at the Galician town of Tuchów as he "headed for the synagogue. In the dim evening light, he saw that the benches and the pulpit had been destroyed, the walls were bare, the floor covered with scraps of prayer books, broken glass, hay, and what he realized was human excrement. The next morning, An-sky saw the town in daylight and found the destruction 'indescribable.' Most of the Jewish houses had been burnt and the streets were filled with trash. The hundred Galician Jewish families who inhabited the town had taken flight and only 20 Jews remained."

His plans to provide an account of such events in The Destruction of Galicia read like a prototype for the Memory Books that appeared after World War II. It would provide "descriptions of 200 cities and shtetls in Poland, Galicia and Bukovina, saying what happened there and mentioning hundreds of local Jews."

As the Bolsheviks wrested power from Russia's Provisional Government, An-sky was often on hand to argue against revolutionary excess in encounters with Leon Trotsky and other key Bolsheviks. In one particularly dramatic incident, he argued with the head of the Polish army, Josef Pilsudski, for the release of Yiddish writers captured by the Poles as the Russians were routed on the western front.

An-sky worked on a play based on a dybbuk in the later years of his life. He drew on stories and lifeways he'd recorded during his extensive ethnographic travels. The play, not unlike Sholom Aleichem's Tevye stories, presented shtetl culture at a moment of great change and potential danger. Audiences responded intuitively, both during An-sky's lifetime, when he read his manuscript to colleagues and friends, and after his death, when the play was presented in Yiddish, Hebrew and English, followed "by films, operas, ballets and stage versions in many languages."

Much of An-sky's unpublished work appeared after his death, thanks to the efforts of friends and supporters. But The Dybbuk is undoubtedly his singular influence on contemporary Jewish culture. Like the Golem of Prague, An-sky's Dybbuk has come to symbolize Jewish art and life of the pre-World War II era. Gabriella Safran's Wandering Soul conveys how much more of the Jewish 20th century The Dybbuk's creator explored and described in his work.

Norman Ravvin's recent books include a novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press), and the co-edited volume Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein (McGill-Queen's).

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Writer enjoys using alliteration

The impetus to begin writing was Wagman's 50th birthday. "I found that 50 gave me the freedom to actually have the time to write this book," said Wagman, who has two sons in their 20s.

Finding a story came easily to her once she found the time to write. "I teach [students to] 'write about what you know' – these are going to be the most successful stories." Wagman did just that. "I know Petunia because she's my voice," she said. "I hope, too, that children find her endearing."

Wagman incorporated alliteration into the story, using P-words throughout. She also made the book a learning experience with challenging vocabulary and an important lesson for children.

"I think it's an opportunity to see that people can change and overcome their fears, including adults," she said. "Children [like Percival] can be problem solvers, and they have a voice."

Wagman wrote about 20 drafts until she was finally satisfied with every word in the story. Then, she brought illustrator Robyn Gram on board to bring Petunia and her world to life.

"I wanted to find an illustrator who actually had my vision of what I wanted Petunia to be," she said. The book is bright and colourful, and Petunia's library brings to mind the Thornhill Woods school library that Wagman decorated. "It's exactly like I visualized it in my head," she said of how the drawings turned out.

Because of the tough market for publishing picture books, Wagman decided to self-publish under the name Teapot Publications, a decision she is happy she made.

Thornhill Woods Public School teacher and librarian wrote and published her first children's book called Petunia Peachim's Predicament. *[Michelle Bitran photo]

"I loved the idea that I had complete control over the text, over the illustration," she said. "The book I wrote is the book I wanted."

With the help of her friends, family, colleagues and school parents, Wagman was able to put together not only her book, but also a marketing plan that has allowed her to begin selling it. "My support system has been fabulous," she said.

Petunia Peachim's Predicament, which has already been bought by children's book wholesaler Tinlids and Toronto bookshop Another Story, will be debuted to Wagman's students this fall, since it was completed only after the kids went on summer vacation. Following that, she will have a book signing at Indigo in Richmond Hill.

For more information about Petunia Peachim's Predicament, please email teapotpublications@rogers.com or call 905-886-1932.

Israel to take part in World Baseball Classic qualifiers

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israel isn't the first country that comes to mind when you think about baseball.

But next month, Jewish and Israeli ball players will compete in the qualifying round of the World Baseball Classic.

The international tournament, which takes place every four years, was started by Major League Baseball in 2005 largely to fill a void left by baseball's removal as a sport at the summer Olympic Games. The qualifying round kicks off Sept. 19 in Jupiter, Fla,. when the Israeli squad takes on the team from South Africa.

The Israeli team is being put together by the Israel Association of Baseball (IAB), and players need only be of Jewish descent or native Israeli to make the roster.

Well, they should have some skill, too. And this team does.

It's managed by former Major League all-star catcher Brad Ausmus, who recently reconnected with his Jewish roots – his mother is Jewish – and visited Israel in May, where he laid tfillin for the first time while touring the Kotel.

Ausmus' coaching staff will include other former MLBers Gabe Kapler and Shawn Green.

The IAB said it has also contacted other active Jewish MLB stars. Milwaukee Brewers outfielder Ryan Braun, Chicago White Sox third baseman Kevin Youkilis, Texas Rangers second baseman Ian Kinsler, New York Mets first baseman Ike Davis and San Diego Padres right-handed pitcher Jason Marquis have all been approached to play for Israel should it make it to the actual tournament, which will be be held in March 2013.

Glenn Copeland, a consulting physician with the Toronto Blue Jays, will be Israel's team doctor.

Haim Katz, president of the IAB, said the final deadline for the qualifying round roster is Sept. 12, so it was impossible to provide a complete list of players before then.

"We will not know the final roster until then, as some players will be called up by their major league teams, and chas v'chalilah, injuries will affect the final roster," he said.

"We only have former MLB players playing for us, since the qualifying tournament takes place during the MLB season and the teams won't release their stars for the [World Baseball Classic] qualifiers. Should we win, however, the tournament itself will be held in March 2013 before the next MLB season starts. Then we can expect to have some current MLBers join our team."

Last week, Youkilis told Israeli Sports Radio that if he's healthy, he'll play for Israel. He also said other Jewish MLBers are interested in playing.

Howard Osterer, an expatriate Canadian and tour guide living in Jerusalem, guided Ausmus and his wife around Israel earlier this summer.

When not shepherding tourists around the country, Osterer, 57, is one of Israel's most experienced baseball umpires.

The former Ottawa resident also played minor league ball with the Ottawa Sooners. He made aliyah in 2008.

Though he doesn't officiate in the Israel Baseball League, the country's premier league, he umps in most of the others, preferring to provide his skills to the junior circuits.

Osterer, who recently returned from travelling with Israel's under-12 baseball team to the European championships in the Czech Republic – Israel finished a respectable fourth – told The CJN that baseball is beginning to flourish in the Holy Land.

"Baseball in Israel is very popular. More than 1,000 players at all age levels from eight to 55" are playing the game, he said.

"I am a grassroots guy who believes in developing baseball from the bottom up."

Osterer said there are teams all over Israel now, including in Be'er Sheva, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Hod Hasharon, Modi'in, Efrat, Ma'alei Adumin, Ra'anana, Kfar Saba, Tel Mond, Ginot Shomron, Even Yehuda, Bet Shemesh, Yuvalim, Gezer and Rehovot.

The IAB is also on a fundraising drive to raise $4 million to build the country's first dedicated baseball stadium in Ra'anana.

Asked what he thought about the Israeli team's chances at the World Baseball Classic, Osterer said: "It's baseball. Anything can happen."

Stoudemire to help coach Canadian Maccabiah team

Amare Stoudemire

Compiled by CJN staff

NBA all-star Amare Stoudemire will take on assistant coaching duties for the Canadian men's basketball team at the 19th Maccabiah Games next summer.

The New York Knicks power forward was in Toronto recently to observe the national team's tryouts and advise coach John Dore on which players he thought should make the team.

Dore had asked Stoudemire to help him coach the team.

Stoudemire last visited Israel in July 2010. At the time, he announced via Twitter that he was there exploring his Jewish roots after learning that his mother has Jewish lineage.

The Maccabiah Games are scheduled begin in Jerusalem on July 18, 2013.

Jewish music veterans debut new album

Michelle Bitran
Intern

For the members of Jump Babylon, Jewish music doesn't have to sound traditional. In fact, the seven musicians, four of whom are also members of Shtreiml, a veteran Jewish music group in Montreal, are mixing their Jewish and klezmer influences with rock and roll and reggae elements.

"I would say it's essentially a rock album with lyrics inspired by the Jewish experience, and [it] blends Neil Young angst with chassidic wedding sensibilities," said the band's composer and producer Jason Rosenblatt, 39, of Jump Babylon's debut album Soldier Woman.

In addition to writing most of the music, Rosenblatt plays keys and harmonica, and also sings for the band. He is joined by his wife, trombone player Rachel Lemisch, guitarist and lead singer Adam Stotland, drummer Thierry Arsenault, bassist Joel Kerr, trumpet player James Rhodes and saxophone player Andrew Skowronski.

Rosenblatt, Lemisch, Arsenault and Stotland got their start, along with fellow musician Michael Winograd, as Shtreiml in 2002, playing klezmer music at bars, festivals and weddings. The band quickly gained a following, performing in North America, Europe and Israel.

For Rosenblatt, learning to play klezmer was simply another part of his extensive musical education. "Everyone in my family plays an instrument," he said, adding that, because there isn't an abundance of Jewish musicians in Montreal, he and his family were approached to take part in the city's Jewish music scene.

Rosenblatt began by playing the blues on piano and harmonica, later studying jazz piano in Israel, where he lived for about five years. He also joined KlezKanada, a Quebec-based organization dedicated to fostering Jewish art and culture.

"That's what got me really into klezmer," Rosenbaltt said of KlezKanada, where he is now a staff member.

Although he has been a professional musician for years, Rosenblatt continues to study and improve his playing skills. A grant given to him by the Canada Council for the Arts in recognition of his musical achievements gave him the opportunity to study harmonica with Grammy Award-winning musician and harmonica master Howard Levy.

Levy helped Rosenblatt learn to play a diatonic harmonica chromatically, meaning that he can use a special technique to produce many more notes than the harmonica was created to play. This technique is only practised by a handful of people in the world.

"It's a difficult instrument in the sense that nothing's visual in the instrument – everything happens in your mouth," Rosenblatt said of learning to master the harmonica.

The technique he has learned for harmonica playing has allowed Rosenblatt to use the instrument in nearly every style of music, including klezmer, jazz and even Turkish music.

Despite the reputation for klezmer Rosenblatt earned with Shtreiml, he and the band often played rock and roll covers during their gigs. The covers were popular with their audiences and, about a year ago, the band members decided to pursue their love of rock under a separate band name to keep their different music styles distinct.

It was then that Jump Babylon was born. "We wanted something that sounded fun, like 'jump,' and something that sounded biblical, like 'Babylon,'" Rosenblatt said with a laugh, explaining that the band name was chosen from a long list of possibilities created during a band brainstorming session.

Keeping a "biblical" aspect was important to Rosenblatt, as Jump Babylon's music may have a rock and roll edge, but it is still distinctly Jewish. The lyrics paraphrase Jewish texts or tell stories of the Jewish immigrant experience in Canada. Even the album's name, Soldier Woman, is a reference to Eshet Chayil, Woman of Valour, from the Book of Proverbs.

"The hard part was the lyrics, sitting down and saying, 'How Jewish do I want to get, how personal do I want to get, will it be literal translations?'" Rosenblatt said.

The fourth track on the album, Canada, which Rosenblatt wrote, tells a story common to many Jews. The lyrics speak about Holocaust survivors who moved to Canada with nothing, started a family and a successful business, but still never forgot the terrors they experienced in Europe.

This story is similar to that of Rosenblatt's grandparents and the grandparents of his friends. "A lot of people feel a Jewish connection through their grandparents," he said, adding that, when he discusses Judaism with new friends, the conversation often turns to one's family roots. "The first thing you say is, 'Where are your grandparents from?'"

The result of Jump Babylon's effort to fuse Judaism and rock is unique and catchy. "I wanted to do something original," Rosenblatt said, and he and the band certainly accomplished that goal.

Jump Babylon debuted Soldier Woman on Aug. 28, as a part of the annual Montreal Jewish Music Festival.

The band will be playing several local shows in October and November and going on a tour through Canada and the United States in 2013.

Rosenblatt and his wife will be bringing their three young children on tour with them. "We pack them all in the car... and we schlep," he said with a laugh.

For Rosenblatt and his musical family, touring is just part of a job he loves. "I consider myself extremely, extremely fortunate to make a career [of music.]"

Friends and family might say…

"Oh, you're early again. You're always the first ones to come," the hostess said as I was standing at our friend's door last Rosh Hashanah. I really felt welcome right away.

Throughout the evening, there were more pearls of wisdom such as: "Your face looks amazing. No wrinkles. I always say it's better to gain some weight and have a young looking face!" Or, "Your kids have such a healthy appetite, bless them!" Or, "Well if she were taller, thin and blond, she'd look fine."

Rosh Hashanah is coming, and we all could use some warnings about what we might expect to hear from our friends and loved ones, so be brave. Here are some examples.

"Enough already! If you fight on Rosh Hashanah, you'll fight all year long!"

"This is the last time I'm inviting people over. Next year, each at his own home!"

"We'll see you all, right here, bli neder – without our vowing to do so – next year!"

"Every time it's her turn to invite us, she suddenly doesn't feel very well."

"Your girl doesn't want to eat? Never mind, she doesn't look starved, if you know what I mean."

"Did you come before or after your hairdresser appointment?"

"What can I tell you? Some people have it easy in life."

"Does anybody care if I'm dead or alive at all?"

"I can't remember the last time I laughed, believe me."

"What does he do for a living?"

"Is he Jewish? Why didn't he want to join you tonight?"

"He married her for the money, why else? Scarlet Johansson, she's not."

"Is Scarlet Johansson really Jewish? Unbelievable. She's so beautiful."

"Someone else would have kicked him out a long time ago!"

"You're in for a treat. I prepared slides from our last trip!"

"You're in for a treat, I prepared slides of our renovated bathroom at the cottage!"

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

"Who made the gefilte fish? Is it fresh? Are you sure?"

"What can I say? Your daughter sure loves her men short, eh?"

"Me? When I was born, I was totally blond!"

"Nice hair colour. They have it on sale now."

"So many guys wanted me, why I chose him, I don't know."

"Aren't you cold, wearing that mini-skirt?"

"You love him? What sign is he? Nah, not good. Bad, actually!"

And the list goes on and on. Remember – these are the people we're supposed to love.

My dear readers and friends, for now, this is a goodbye. Over the last five years that I've been writing this column, I enjoyed your warm messages to me. I met with some of you, and even made some new friends. I'd like to thank you from the bottom of my heart for entering my life. (You can still read my Hebrew column.)

So, darlings, love you all. God bless, and all the best, Nina.

In large nonstick skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat. Sprinkle fish with dill, salt and pepper. Fry fish, in batches, turning once, until crisp, golden and fish flakes easily, 8 min. Transfer to platter; cover and keep warm. Reduce heat to medium. Add onion and garlic to pan; fry bout 4 min. Add 3/4 c stock, wine, lemon juice, vinegar and honey; boil 2 min., scraping up any brown bits from pan. Whisk remaining stock with cornstarch; whisk into pan; cook about 2 min. until thickened Spoon over fish. Garnish with dill sprigs.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa asks whether Israel stand alone or will its allies stand at its side?

Given Iran's illicit drive for nuclear weapons and penchant for anti-Semitism and hatred, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon — who is going to Tehran for the conference of the "non-aligned movement"— should have stayed away from the Islamic Republic, says Gerald M. Steinberg who heads NGO Monitor and is professor of political science at Bar Ilan University.

Humorist of Jewishness dies at 47

JTA

WASHINGTON — David Rakoff, a humorist who often wrote about American Jewish culture, has died.

Rakoff, 47, died in Manhattan of cancer on Aug. 9, a disease he has battled since he was 22, according to media reports.

A frequent contributor to National Public Radio's This American Life, Rakoff, a Montreal native, embraced his misfortunes with a cheerful negativity.

A book of his essays was named Half Empty.

"Optimism is not for everybody," he told Tablet magazine in a 2010 podcast. "There are a lot of people who are simply going to feel anxious no matter what – it predates consciousness almost, it's pre-verbal, it's the way you are and ultimately it's as value neutral as having brown eyes."

At a public memorial service held at Congregation Habonim in Toronto recently, storyteller Eli Rubinstein, the congregation's religious leader, who is also the national director of the March of the Living, spoke about the late artist, saying that not only was he a great artist but also a true "mensch and a virtuous person."

"It is not uncommon for us to hear of individuals who were great artists, but when it came to friendships or personal acts of kindness, we're more than a little deficient. We often, then, try to make excuses for them, as if their genius in one field, gave them a free pass in all other areas of life.

"But that was not the case with Davey I was told – with all the brilliance he had – whether in writing, speaking or painting – he was still a mensch, a virtuous person, a wonderful and caring son, brother, uncle, friend," Rubinstein said.

"As the family told me, 'For the people he loved he would do absolutely anything…'

"And this kindness extended to many others as well: a restaurant waiter, a taxi driver, or to be more specific, the doorman at his new building, who he was the first to give a meal to on Thanksgiving, or the little boy who was supposed to join him on the set of [The Daily Show with Jon Stewart]. When, at the last minute, the boy was not allowed to attend, David made sure to purposely tug on his ear during the show, which was a pre-arranged signal, a shout-out to one little boy during a show watched by millions, or those in his circle who were suffering from terminal illnesses."

His older sister, Ruth, also spoke lovingly about her brother's love of people.

"My Davey's true talent, the most remarkable of his gifts, was his commitment to being a devoted friend. I believe he worked harder and more consistently at his copious friendships and social encounters than he did at anything else in his life. No passing kindness to Davey went unrewarded," she said.

"If you were lucky enough to be among the scores of people who he considered friends and you needed anything from him… he would drop everything and be available and reliable and competent. And if you were lucky enough to be a child in his life, and there are many beyond his beloved nephews and niece, you would be the recipient of handmade gifts and birthdays always remembered and an interest in what you were doing."

Eulogies were also given by his older brother, Simon; Dr. Mark Greenberg, a senior staff oncologist at the Hospital for Sick Children and a close family friend; and David's father, prominent Toronto psychiatrist Vivian Rakoff, who addressed the gathering without prepared notes, concluding his eulogy by saying that it was as if Davey was a stage director and his instructions to the cast were "Exit Dancing."
